War Against War Is Declared By Episcopal Church

Resolution Adopted After Long Debate Over Report Of Committee Of 10

A resolution urging "unremitting war against war" was adopted by the house of deputies of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States on Oct. 22 at Atlantic City after a long debate over a report of the committee of ten dealing with national and international affairs, says a recent report in the Christian Science Monitor.

The resolution adopted took the form of a substitute for the resolution submitted by the committee, whose report was strongly criticized when it came up for consideration by the general convention last week, some of the delegates characterizing it as "straddling, non-committal" and as practically repudiating the bishop's pastoral, known as the Davenport pastoral, of last November.

Offered by Dean Washburn

The resolution adopted today was offered by the Rev. Henry Bradford Washburn, Dean of Cambridge Theological Seminary, and follows:

"That we affirm that war as a method of settling international disputes is incompatible with the teachings of Christ, and that when nations have bound themselves by treaties, other nations should refuse to countenance their going to war. The Christian church must wage an unremitting war against war."

Mr. George Wharton Pepper, onetime United States Senator from Pennsylvania and Secretary of the committee of ten, characterized the language of this resolution as that of the Kellogg-Briand Pact.

Strong support of the convention going on record against war developed at the meeting today. The Rev. Elmore McKee, of Buffalo, declared that the most important thing for the convention to do was to convince the American public that it was not a reactionary body.

Fearless Leaders

"The greatest memorial any of us can erect to ourselves is to be fearless leaders in definite action like this," he said. "It is the younger members of this convention who will be involved in the next war if it comes."

The Washburn resolution was the second substitute for the committee of ten resolution to be offered today, the first having been by Dr. Russell Bowie, Rector of Grace Church, New York City, but it was lost by a vote of 194 to 128.

The house of deputies also adopted a resolution to the effect that the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States shall take part with other great peace organizations in a world conference of churches on war and peace.

Both resolutions will now go before the house of bishops for action.

Later, the House of Deputies upheld the conscientious objector in wartime and instructed that a petition be addressed to Congress for legislation giving the same status to any Christian as is now given in wartime to members of the Society of Friends. They passed a resolution which extended sympathy to the Jews and other persecuted minorities, favored social insurance and unemployment, old-age, sickness and accident insurance.

Services commemorating the 150th anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Samuel Seabury as first American bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church were held yesterday with Bishop William T. Manning delivering the sermon.

Bishop Manning described the Protestant Episcopal Church as "fundamentally and definitely catholic" and declared it could not join in a union with any other Protestant denomination unless the latter accepted the apostolic traditions of the Episcopacy.

Clamor Started For U. S. Visas In Soviet Union

'Red' And 'Black' Americans Desire To Retain Or Recover Citizenship

The discovery that there are several thousand present or former American citizens working and living in the Soviet Union and that the overwhelming majority desire to retain or recover their American citizenship, has been revealed by the opening in Moscow of the American Embassy and consular services, after a lapse of 16 years, says a recent article in the Christian Science Monitor, which follows.

The American consular staff in charge of passports and visas in Moscow has faced very strenuous work since offices were opened last April.

The intermediate status of hundreds of naturalized citizens in Russia has posed many knotty problems for consular officials. In its first three months the consulate-general issued 49 new passports and renewed 131 others. But at least double this number was referred to Washington for final action, since they require more than routine attention. Many former American citizens report that their passports have been lost or stolen, while other naturalized citizens have forfeited their status by remaining for more than five years in Russia. The latter argue that they did not have money to leave Russia and had no opportunity to put their cases before American officials until the consulate-general opened here. For this reason, they ask special consideration.

"Reds" and "Blacks"

The Americans in Russia fall for the most part into two classes, the "reds" and the "blacks," as they are popularly known. The former came to Russia because they were sympathetic with the Communist Revolution. The greater part of these had lived in Russia under the Tsars, many being Jews against whom the Tsarist Government especially discriminated, and the Revolution seemed to them the dawn of a new day.

The "blacks" were victims of the depression in the United States. They could not find work and came to Russia because they had been told they could get work here. Soviet recruiting agents enlisted thousands of these people to share in the work of industrializing Russia. About 3,000 American Finns, for example, have been working for two or three years in the lumber camps of Karelia. They were not interested in politics, but merely wanted jobs.

The writer talked with one of the "blacks," who may be regarded as typical. He is a carpenter by trade, and said that he was unable to find work in the United States for three years before he came to Russia. He came here with his family and has had continuous work since. "Living conditions are very hard here, for myself and my family," he said. "If I had work in America, we would all be much happier there."

However, even if assured of work, this man and many others of his kind cannot now return to the United States. They are paid in Soviet paper rubles which have little value outside of Russia and cannot be used to buy steamship tickets. They have no means of obtaining the necessary "valuta" or foreign currency, to pay their way back to America. Unless there is some radical change in Soviet currency regulations, they must remain here, and if they are naturalized will eventually lose their American citizenship.

Among the American "reds" in Russia there is a variety of types. There are some convinced Communists, who voluntarily abandoned their American citizenship when they first came here, and joined the Russian Communist Party. They are given the privileges and obligations which such membership implies, and have joined earnestly in the process of building a "dictatorship of the proletariat." But there are others, of a more objectionable type, who are endeavoring strenuously to retain American citizenship. "Sure, I'm a Red," said one such man to the writer. "But why should I surrender my American passport? It helps me here. I get privileges I wouldn't get without it."

A few at least of those Americans who came to Russia expecting to find Utopia have been disillusioned. Some who voluntarily abandoned their citizenship in the first flush of enthusiasm are endeavoring to recover it. They are basing their claim upon the fact that the Soviet Government requires no "oath of allegiance" from its citizens, and that they therefore have technically never ceased to be American citizens. This subtle point is one upon which the State Department will have to rule.

Discouraged

The writer talked to one man who was a member of the American Communist Party for many years before he came to Russia. He is a native-born American, a sincere and clear-sighted idealist. For several years he has worked in Soviet factories, refusing offers of "white collar" jobs in order to mingle with the workers and take an active part in their social life. Now, however, he is endeavoring to accumulate the necessary "valuta" to return to America.

"I cannot endure the exploitation of the working man which goes on here as it does in other countries," he declared. "My Russian Communist friends tell me that I am not patient, that I do not understand this is a temporary phase. But Soviet methods of exploitation of their own workers, whatever the avowed purpose of such treatment may be, are more ruthless and crude than any to which I have been accustomed in my own country. There is less consideration for the average working man in Russia today than in any 'capitalist' country with which I am familiar."

This man is not embittered. He believes in the sincerity of Russian Communist leaders who are so ruthlessly exploiting their own workers now in the hope of building a new social order in some distant future. But he is not able to agree that any end, however idealistic, justifies the present methods by which he declares the rights of individual working men are ignored in the allegedly higher interests of the "Workers' State."

I asked this man if he would rejoin the Communist Party when he returned to his own country. He shook his head. "I could not join the party again if I wanted to," he said. "The party would not admit me after I had told them the truth about conditions among working people in the Soviet Union. They would not believe me, and would say that I had become a traitor to my class."

Millikan Gives Explanation Of Modified Theory

Physicist Holds To Old Views Of Creation Of Matter With Slight Alteration

The theory of the convertibility of mass into radiant energy has been called upon by astronomers for at least thirty years because they see no other way to account for the enormous quantities of heat given off by the stars in the eons during which we have evidence that they have been existing, says Robert A. Millikan, world famous physicist in a recent article to the New York Times.

In 1905 Einstein set up the equation $E=MC^2$, which gives the relation between mass transformed into radiant energy and the radiant energy resulting from the transformation. All this is the orthodox astronomical theory of the present day. Similarly, when we found the enormous energy of individual cosmic rays we could see no reasonable way of accounting for these energies except by this same transformation of mass into radiant energy. And when I made my first estimates I could see no mechanism through which such energies could be obtained save through such transformation of mass into radiant energy. From the known mass of the hydrogen atom and the known mass of helium or oxygen or silicon we could compute with the aid of the Einstein equation the amount of energy to be expected in an individual cosmic ray if it originated in the act of building up an atom of one of these common, heavy elements like oxygan or silicon, for example, out of hydrogen.

Comparing Weight of Atoms

This had to be a change in which matter was converted into radiant energy, for the simple reason that sixteen atoms of hydrogen are actually found to weigh more than one atom of oxygen; eyt we know that those sixteen atoms of hydrogen have gone into the building up. And I have been repeatedly pointing out for the last six years or so that my estimated energies of the chief component of cosmic radiation are of the right order of magnitude to correspond to this kind of an origin.

Some have called this building up of the common elements out of hydrogen the creation of matter, although as far as I know I myself have never used that phrase. In other words, the transformation of mass into radiant energy through the building up of common elements out of hydrogen—which in my London paper I called the "partial annihilation of matter"—is one and the same thing with what some have chosen to call the "creation of matter."

There is one other suggestion as to the source of the energy of cosmic rays, which I have always thought untenable but which recent experiments have seemed to me to have rendered particularly untenable. So that when I say that the only cause of the cosmic rays in sight is some form of the annihilation of matter—that is, the transformation of mass into radiation in accordance with the requirements of the Einstein equation—I am only reiterating the view to which I have been giving expression whenever I have speculated at all about the origin of the cosmic rays.

Evidence Holds Good

The apparent rough agreement between the estimated energy of the chief component—actually the least penetrating component—of the cosmic rays, and the energy computed from the theory of the building up of one of the common elements like oxygen, silicon or iron out of hydrogen, is the only bit of evidence we have had in confirmation of this view. This evidence is just as good today as it has ever been; indeed, our new experiments have given us more certain knowledge than we have had heretofore of the energy contained in this chief component of cosmic radiation.

Our newer experiments have also brought forward convincing evidence of the existence of cosmic ray energies very much higher than those of this chief component, concerning the values of which we have heretofore been in ignorance.

We now know that there are some very penetrating components of the cosmic rays which have energies higher than those which can correspond to any such transformation of mass into radiant energy as occurs when the heaviest elements we know anything about are assumed to be formed suddenly out of the process of building them up out of hydrogen. There has been some discussion in the past as to whether the cosmic rays might not be produced by complete annihilation of hydrogen atoms instead of the partial transformation of mass into radiant energy involved in the building of heavier elements out of hydrogen.

I have stated in the past that this process of complete annihilation was, in my judgment, inadequate to account for the cosmic rays, because it would furnish an energy larger than that required to account for the chief component which actually does something like 90 per cent of the ionizing of the atmosphere which is done at all by cosmic rays. So I have seen no reason in the past for assuming that this process was going on where cosmic rays seemed to come from—namely, from intergalactic space—although I have followed the speculations of most modern astronomers in assuming that this process is going on in some way inside the stars.

High Energies Discovered

Our new measurements on the energies of the most penetrating components of the cosmic rays, however—directly made in our laboratories—have revealed the existence of cosmic ray energies as high as six billion electron volts. And our discovery of the fact that a few electrons coming from outside and striking the earth in the equatorial belt (this is what we all agree produces the so-called "latitude effect" in cosmic rays) has made it necessary to assume that some of the incoming rays have energies as high as or higher, possibly, than ten billion electron volts. Energies of this sort are far higher than those that can be obtained by the process of building up any of the heavier elements out of hydrogen. Indeed, ten billion electron volts is an energy close to that which, in accordance with the Einstein equation, would be produced by the sudden, complete annihilation of a whole atom of carbon. And if, as is at least possible, some of these enormously powerful rays have energies of sixteen billion electron volts, this would correspond to the total energy that would be transformed from matter into radiant energy if a complete atom of oxygen were suddenly annihilated.

That such a complete annihilation of the whole of an atom can take place all at once will be doubted by many physicists and astronomers; and I am far from asserting that it does. Nevertheless it is true that there is no other tenable source of energy in sight which would yield the cosmic ray energies that we actually observe. One can take this merely as evidence of the depth of our ignorance of the origin of these cosmic rays, or if he is so inclined he can take it as evidence that such annihilation processes actually take place. I was merely pointing out to a group of physicists assembled in London that, as far as I could see, there are no other alternatives in sight.

Einstein Equation Upheld

My whole presentation of evidence in the past has been based, as I have repeatedly stated, on the validity of the Einstein equation. The fact that this equation, when applied to the building of helium, oxygen, silicon and iron, seemed to give energies close to those found in the chief components of the cosmic rays has been taken as evidence that this building-up process has been going on. Now, within the past two years, we have been using Einstein's equation to compute the energies imparted to the two helium atoms which we actually prove are produced when a nucleus of a single hydrogen atom—a proton—enters a lithium atom. This is a case in which we are creating two new atoms out of the interaction of two others, and we have actually found cases in which heavier atoms have been produced in this way—out of a union of light elements. In other words, we are now doing in our laboratories the same sort of thing which I have been assuming to be taking place in interstellar space. It is by this process exactly that we are now producing twelve-million volt gamma rays—four times higher than any which come off naturaly radioactive substances.

World Revolution Again Proclaimed By U.S.S.R. Press

70th Anniversary Of Establishment Of 1st International Is Celebrated

The imminence of world revolution was again enthusiastically proclaimed by the Soviet press on Sept. 29 after several months of reticence on the subject.

Lavish publicity was accorded to the celebration here, the night before, of the seventieth anniversary of the establishment of the First International. The celebration was attended by a large gathering of international Communists, who unanimously adopted the resolution, "Long live the Comintern (Communist International) and its leader of genius, Joseph Stalin."

The keynote speech of the occasion was made by Bela Kun, former Hungarian Communist dictator, who declared he detected the beginning now of a united world proletarian movement to "abolish all capitalist enslavements."

"With such a powerful base as the Soviet Union, with its Bolshevist party, its socialized industry and agriculture, its Red Army and its leader, Stalin," M. Kun said, "the international proletariat has become a decisive influence in world politics."

The Russian Communist party organ, Pravda, under large photographs of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin, editorially proclaimed:

"Lenin led the proletariat to Socialist revolutionary victory in one-sixth of the world, established the Communist International and headed the struggle during the first period of wars and revolution. In the second period of wars and revolution Lenin's Communist International, under Comrade Stalin's leadership, will lead the proletariat of all countries to Socialist revolution throughout the world."

Meanwhile the Communist International, the avowed purpose of which is to foment and carry through this world proletarian uprising, has issued instructions from its permanent headquarters in Moscow to Communist parties abroad to select delegates and prepare to attend the world congress, scheduled to be held here early next year.

That congress, which will be the first since 1928, was originally announced for this year, but it was postponed without public explanations. The Soviet Government organ, Izvestia, and the Red army organ, Red Star, have even refrained from publishing announcements of the scheduled congress.

Communist organizations abroad are now instructed to familiarize their members with the agenda for the coming meeting. The subjects to be discussed include campaigns against fascism.

Recalls Stalin-Trotsky Dispute

The inactivity of the Communist International has been marked ever since Joseph Stalin embarked on his program for socialism in Russia first, which coincided roughly with the inauguration of the first Five-Year Plan and the expulsion of Leon Trotzky from the Soviet Union. M. Stalin differed on this point as well as on others with M. Trotsky, who advocated world revolution as an essential of Marxism.

M. Trotsky likewise differed with the Soviet dictator on measures for forcing the peasants into a Socialist scheme of things in Russia, but it has been said that both in this matter and in that of world revolution the two men disagreed only on the question of the time for action, in each case M. Trotsky having advocated earlier action.

New Deal Drift After Elections Puzzles Capital

Trend To Right Expected, But President Yet To Commit Self Definitely

Washington is as much in the air as ever over the program which the Administration will seek to carry out after election. To what extent the New Deal in the last two years of Mr. Roosevelt's current term will be identical with the New Deal of the first part of Administration is as much of a mystery as here tofore.

F. D. Roosevelt

It is a strange fact that in this year of a Congressional campaign, with the election almost at hand, there is but little discussion in the national capital concerning the possible result. Absence of such discussion is noted by oldtime politicians and political experts of both parties. What talk there is has relation chiefly to the outcome in certain states and Congressional districts and touches the question of whether this veteran or that in Senate or House will be re-elected or defeated.

Democratic Victory Accepted

It remains true, as it has for weeks, that Democratic victory in a national sense is admittedly a foregone conclusion, and also that attention is being more and more directed to the question of what the Democrats will do with the victory when they get it.

Undoubtedly, the impression has been gaining ground through the country that President Roosevelt plans to take a more conservative course and to work more in harmony and consonance with the business, industrial and financial interests. This idea has been held out in numerous utterances from Cabinet members and others who are supposed to be spokesmen for the Administration or who assume to speak for it. While Donald R. Richberg has decried the idea that it is necessary to have an early balancing of the budget, and thus has trespassed on the orthodox views, the President has counteracted reports that he has in mind a new devaluation of the dollar to increase prices.

President Speaks Wednesday

The President will speak next Wednesday to the American Bankers' Association, and it is generally expected that the address will be pacific. As described in some quarters, it will seek co-operation of the bankers with the government, rather than attack them for failure to co-operate—which has been more or less the fashion in high government circles.

Conservatives May Be Disappointed

It would be difficult to point to anything which President Roosevelt has said recently which binds him to a more conservative course, and there is a growing belief that his legislative recommendations will be disappointing to conservatives of his party and generally.

In some respects the most important economic proposal that will be forced on the new Congress will be the thirty-hour week, which organized labor is demanding in earnest. The President, it is true, is opposed to the thirty-hour week and will not get behind the Black-Connery bill for that end. But by establishing the thirty-six-hour week in the cotton garment industry the President has clearly indicated that he is ready to go a considerable distance in shortening work hours. In other words, while the Administration may not be willing to go as far as demanded by organized labor, there is every indication that it will in a large degree accede to labor's demands.

Radically Minded Congress Seen

In the udgment of not a few able observers in and out of Congress, President Roosevelt will not be in a position to hold his party to a conservative course, or to swing it to the right after election. As some of them put it, the New Deal has been encouraging radical forces, which are much easier to set in motion than to stop. The approach of the election emphasizes more and more plainly what was indicated months ago—that the new Congress will be a radical body, or, at least, will have an exceptionally strong radical contingent.

It will contain a long list of members who have won votes by telling their constituents the scope of government, expenditures, and painting the advantages of largess from the Treasury, and making promises to work for continuation of the bounty from Washington; who have told the voters much about new plans for government beneficance, and little about the Constitution, or about the magnitude of the public debt and what it means eventually in high taxes.

Congress To Be a Problem

In encouraging Democratic candidates to talk about Federal dispensation of funds in their districts, James A. Farley, national chairman, undoubtedly has increased the list of those of his party who will be elected to Congress, but he has also increased the difficulty the Administration faces in meeting the demands of the new Congress.

Vague talk is heard in Washington about paring the budget. But it is clear that the new Congress will be a spending institution. The call for big expenditures is certain to be insistent. It is not possible at this time to calculate how the the Administration can hold those expenditures in check to any great extent. While in theory the President can always use the veto, in this instance he cannot well use it in the face of the assurances given by a multitude of Democratic candidates that Democratic success this fall will mean continued government benefits.

It will be of moment to the Administration whether the progressive Republican or insurgent bloc in Congress, especialy in the Senate, is strengthened or weakened. If Senator Robert M. La Follette, of Wisconsin, Senator Henrik Shipstead, of Minnesota, and Senator Bronson Cutting, of New Mexico, are defeated, the Administration will have little worry about the insurgent bloc.

But if they are re-elected, it is certain that the insurgent bloc will be a militant group, not amenable to White House wishes, especially since the Democratic organization has tried to unhorse them. What Mr. Roosevelt has to apprehend, if he tries to take a conservative course after election, is open war with the Senate insurgents, provided they are not virtually wiped out at the polls.

More Radical Than New Deal

Other Presidents have found the insurgent bloc a troublesome factor; and President Roosevelt is likely to have the same experience, unless he goes along with it and supports the radical ideas for which it stands—ideas which go farther than the New Deal, and which were advocated by men like the elder La Follette, Norris and other insurgents long before many of the New Dealers got into politics.

Hitler's Right To Life Tenure Is Cited By Aid

Constitutional Limitation Of His Term Held Removed By August Law

If any German entertained a doubt that Adolf Hitler, dictator of the Third Reich, means to retain his position for life, he learned better when Dr. Hans Heinrich Lammers, State Secretary in the chancellery, proclaimed recently that under the law of August 1, 1934—the day before the death of President Paul Von Hindenburg—"Der Fuehrer" was legally entitled to remain dictator, says a Berlin dispatch to The New York Herald Tribune. The story in full follws:

Adolf Hitler

Addressing an audience of prominent Nazi leaders and civil servants at a meeting of the Academy of Administration at Berlin University on "State Leadership in the Third Reich," Dr. Lammers said that state leadership was a question of political power. Moreover, he said, "according to the National Soicalist viewpoint it is primarily a question of personality, and a question of constitutional law only secondarily."

History teaches that strong men have achieved the leadership of the state notwithstanding a deficient constitution, he said, referring to Prince Bismarck, without whose genius the constitution of 1871 would not have worked efficiently. According to Dr. Lammers, state leadership must not necesarily be based on the constitution—certainly not in a National Socialist state.

Unlike the German republican rulers who, after the revolution of 1918 deemed it right to consolidate their new predominance through a new constitution "under the misconception that the people exist for the constitution,' Adolf Hitler renounced the power to give the Germans a different kind of constitution, Dr. Lammers said.

"With his assumption of power the rising tide of National Socialism seized the whole German people, and a new idea of state was carried through automatically," Dr. Lammers said. He reviewed Nazi legislation whereby the question of state leadership was "cleared gradually."

Beginning with the Reichstag election of March, 1933, in which the Nazi party emerged victorious, Dr. Lammers referred to an enabling act late in the same month conferring blanket powers on the Hitler government for a four-year term. He interpreted this law as parliament renouncing its predominance—not as an enabling law, in the former sense of the word.

By this reasoning Hitler assumed supreme power of the state in a perfectly legal way, for President Hindenburg appointed him, the German people gave its vote in referendum, and the Reichstag, as well as the Federal Council, agreed, Dr. Lammers argued. Under these circumstances the Weimar constitution cannot be regarded as a constitution in the sense of an organic statute of state, he said. He added that it lost its validity as a constitution when the so-called Reich's reform law passed the Reichstag, making the important provisions of the Weimar constitution invalid.

"Legal Maxims" Rule Nation

While at present no constitution is formally in existence, "Germany has constitutional conditions through legal maxims under which the life of the natiqn takes place," he said. He discussed the unification of power and the correlative whole responsibility in a single person as being a prominent feature of this legal form.

This development resulted in the law creating the supreme chief of the German Reich August 1, which, Dr. Yammers maintained, also annuls the constitutional regulations of the Presidential term of office. Under this law, according to Dr. Lammers "Adolf Hitler is equipped for his lifetime with the offices of Reich President and Reich Chancellor," these two offices being inseparable, and responsibility to the Reichstag is thereby legaly annulled since the supreme chief of the Reich, "of course," could not be responsible to Parliament.

From the constitutional viewpoint the law combining two offices is absolutely unobjectionable in any respect, Dr. Lammers asserted, calling it "a necessity to safeguard the continuity in office of the Supreme Chief of State."

Even the black shirt itself no longer is held sacred as a symbol belonging exclusively to Sir Oswald's band of British Fascists. Those who have rebelled against his leadership in Gloucestershire are still wearing the black uniform but they have added to it a white armlet to indicate they are fighting their former chief and seeking the cooperation of any other groups who want to rid British politics of his influence.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

The city of Merida, Yucatan, Mexico stands on a bed a sedimentary limestone covered with red earth. The city's water supply lies from 25-50 feet under the bedrock. To obtain water for household use it is necessary to dig wells through the rock and to erect windmills which would pump the water where it is needed. There were more than 2000 windmills in the city of Merida alone when the latest census was taken.

Holland used to be famous for the picturesque presence of windmills in its landscape. The country has vast tracts of land lying under sea level and the windmill was the only means they had then to keep the country dry. Steam pumps have now replaced the ancient windmills with the result that the mill is fast disappearing and there are now believed to be no more than about 800 windmills in all Holland.

Juana The Mad

Juana (1479-1555) was the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella after whose death she succeeded to the Kingdom of Castille and Aragon. She married Philip the Fair of Austria who made her unhappy with his absences and infidelity. She early lost her reason and her insanity became intensified through the death of her husband. Five of Juana's children sat on various thrones of Europe. Her son Charles V ruled over the Empire where the sun never set. Juana is the mother of the two great royal dynasties, the Bourbons and the Hapsburgs. The strain of insanity which she bequeathed to her decendants influenced the history of humanity deeply for more than 400 years.

Social and Personal Notes

LIONIZED BY SOCIETY

That noblest Roman of them all, Babe Ruth, has become quite the social lion of Tokyo. Together with other members of the American baseball team in Tokyo, he has been teaed, lunched, dined and danced as never before. While everyone is glad to greet all the members of the visiting team, it is the Babe whom everyone is most anxious to meet.

Babe Ruth

At the luncheon meeting of the America-Japan society at the Imperial Thursday, several well known citizens were trailing the homerun king with baseballs which they hoped he'd autograph—and which he did.

It was a bright moment for several of the bellhops and girls of the Imperial hotel when the baseball hero autographed his photograph for them the other day while having his shoes shined in the hotel barber shop....and a Tokyo woman will always remember the time she had her hair bobbed—she sat in the next chair to the Babe, a real thrill, she said.

Friday afternoon the baseball players were received at a reception at the American embassy by the Ambassador and Mrs. Joseph Clark Grew. That evening, Mr. and Mrs. Chiba entertained at a party in honor of Babe Ruth, his wife and daughter.

Sunday afternoon, the baseball players will be feted at tea dance, a dinner and evening dance given by the Y.C. and A.C. of Yokohama in the clubhouse.

The last and most important, probably, of the social rounds for the baseball players, will be Monday evening when the American Association gives a dinner dance in the Imperial hotel.

President Gets William, Mary Degree Of LL.D.

should have been also an educator father of American education. He called it fitting that a statesman should have been also an educator and added that education, as it grows, "becomes the partner of government."

In this connection, Mr. Roosevelt lauded those who seek specialization in science and scholarship, but also said there was a place in government as well as other fields of human endeavor for those with "a broad, liberal and nonspecialized education," which he credited Jefferson with instituting here.

Held Brain Trust Defense

This was interpreted as a defense of the President's brain trust, for he added:

"Government is greatly using men and women of this type—people who have the nospecialized point of view and who at the same time have a general and extraordinary comprehensive knowledge, not of the details, but of the progress and the purposes which underlie the work of the specialists themselves."

New President of College

Besides the conferring of the honorary degree upon the President, a part of the ceremony at the college was the induction into office of Mr. Bryan as the institution's nineteenth president. Mr. Bryan, a good Virginia Democrat, was effusive in his praise of President Roosevelt. The speech, however, contained a reference to one of the proud boasts of William and Mary that would not be pleasing to the brain trusters of the New Deal.

"Adam Smith's 'The Wealth of Nation,'" said Mr. Bryan, "was a text book in this college—as the very volumes in our library attest—only eight years after the first edition came from the press to demolish the old mercantilist economy." Adam Smith, the author of the theory of capitalism, is the big bugaboo of the New Dealers who denounce their opponents as apostles of "the law of the tooth and claw."

Mr. Bryan is publisher of the Richmond News-Leader and it might be mentioned that this newspaper is none too friendly to the New Deal.

Old Street Reopened

Just as important on the day's program was the opening by the President of the restored Duke of Gloucester street, where, 300 years ago, Williamsburg was founded in the form of a palisade against the Indians. The President inspected the restored palace of the royal governors, with its magnificent gardens, and drove over the palace green—once traversed by the crown's agents in their royal coach and fours—to the junction with the ancient Duke of Gloucester street.

Youth Is Warned Of Divided Family

Baker Calls Disintegration The Gravest Problem Of Slump For Coming Generation

Disintegration of the American family, as evidenced by the "millions of young people who have taken to the road in boxcars," is the gravest problem growing out of the depression, Newton D. Baker recently told the 1,000 persons attending the Youth Today dinner at New York city, according to the New York Times.

Mr. Baker warned against the belief that the Federal Government was doing all that was needed for relief, and declared that failure to support hospitals and other normal social agencies now would bring tragedy.

Mr. Baker praised the young speakers, who attened the dinner, for their earlier "candid, brave, thoughtful and unselfish" discussions. He said it was "a divine discontent that wants to leave the world better than it is." The world has become better in the past forty years, he said, and the human race has become more "kindly, tolerant and constructive".

The Rev. Daniel A. Poling, president of the International Society of Christian Endeavor, another speaker at the dinner, said he hoped a youth service would soon be established in the Department of the Interior. He praised the CCC camps as the "most constructive feature" of the new administration.

Miss Tarbell Asks Character

Miss Ida M. Tarbell declared that the challenge to the youth of today was the rebuilding of the world. This can be done only through character, she held.

"We cannot give moral law a secondary place," said Miss Tarbell. "Lack of character has pulled down nations, destroyed governments and wrecked institutions."

Their addresses followed an afternoon youth session at which some eighteen young men and women between the ages of 18 and 27 expressed their unanimous opinion that the economic and social order and the adult generation running it were sadly lacking in integrity, social purpose and guidance to youth.

The young speakers declared that one cannot live by the Golden Rule and succeed today, and urged that the "service motive" be substituted for the "profit motive."

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt sat through the afternoon discussions on the "board of review" with Miss Tarbell and Mr. Baker, and often took part in the discussions. She was expected to speak at the dinner also, but was absent. Both the discussion and dinner were at the Hotel Commodore.

Professor Harry Allen Overstreet of City College, who had been chairman of the afternoon session, gave a report of the discussions.

Courtship Seen as Prolonged

In discussing group associations and friendships, Dr. Overstreet asked what effect the depression has had on the marriage of young people. The speakers all said that courtship had been prolonged.

"Many have waited so long they are deciding to take a chance and hope for the best," said Ellsworth Qualey, 21, of 90-21 Seventy-sixth Street, Woodhaven.

Miss Evelyn Rieger said that in her group of thirty girls, all felt that the rearing of a family is the highest social obligation, and urged society to help by providing model low-cost housing for young married couples. Miss Madeline Mr. Beckman, 247 Dean Street, Brooklyn, said that most young people must depend on aid from their parents to marry under present conditions.

Dr. Poling asked for suggestions on what society could do to be of benefit. Philip Schatz of 259 East Seventh Street, offered three suggestions.

"First, I think there should be unemployment insurance," he said. "Second, I believe the government should give some assurance that jobs will last."

"Does that mean," asked Mrs. Roosevelt, "that the government should insure the success of the business?"

He replied that he meant jobs should be on a contract basis.

Government Aid for Marriage

"Many are not getting married because they realize the futility of raising a family and not being able to support it," he continued, "so I advocate birth control information. I also believe the government should encourage marriage by subsidizing it, as foreign governments do."

"The speaker fails to note," said Mrs. Roosevelt, "that foreign governments subsidize marriages, not to promote birth control, but to provide more soldiers."

Frederick S. Philips, 18, of 406 South Third Avenue, Mount Vernon, during the discussion of principles of conduct, said:

"You people are our leaders but we don't know whether we can trust you. We can't say whether the profit or the service motive is best for America."

The other speakers included Arnold A. Lasker, 3,080 Broadway; Laura Stern, 70 Fifth Avenue; Paul Toneman, the Hotel Taft; Ray W. Sweazey, 643 South Tenth Street, Newark; Jean Thomson, 162 Daniel Low Terrace, St. George, S. I.; Grace Tuttle, 74-11 87th Road, Woodhaven; Mary Grazanick, 419 Sterling Place, Brooflyn; Frances Lanzano, 3,106 Villa Avenue, Bronx; John Morsell, 180 West 135th Street, and Edward Gottschall, 261 Nuber Avenue, Mount Vernon.

Loans To Students Wane At Columbia

Evidence Of Recovery Is Seen In The Fewer Requests For Aid From $700,000 Fund

A sharp decrease in the number of applicants for student loans at Columbia University was cited recently as "an evidence that the depression is on the wane," says the New York Times.

Basing his comment on a report of the university loan fund for the last twenty-five years, Nicholas McD. McKnight, associate dean of Columbia College and chairman of the loan fund committee, said that loans this year would total about $150,000. Loans last year reached $183,000.

Mr. McKnight reported that during the twenty-five-year period more than $1,500,000 had been advanced to students by the loan fund. The largest number of loans was made last year, when money for tuition was advanced to 974 students in virtually every department of the university.

Columbia College led the list last year with 289 applications, while loans were made to 176 students in the graduate faculties and to 124 in the law school. Applications ranging in number from fifty to seventy were granted for the medical, engineering and business schools and university extension. The smallest number of loans was the eleven in the optometry course. Twelve each were made for Seth Low Junior College, the School of Library Service and the School of Journalism.

The report does not take in Barnard College and Teachers College, which have their own loan funds.

Mr. McKnight pointed out that about 97 per cent of the loans were for tuition fees. The smallest loan is for $22.50, usually for a student who has failed to figure the student activities fee as part of his expenses. The largest loan is $265, for tuition at the medical school.

The amount paid out last year, $183,000, was paid back during the year by former students whose loans ran back as far as 1911, according to the report. Most of the loans are repaid in instalments of $5 and $10, which are used again for new loans. The fund has a principal of $700,000 and charges 5 per cent interest.

Mr. McKnight said that the loans were granted on a basis of competition after applications had been accepted by three officials in three different departments of the university, including the dean of the school in which the applicant is registered.

Members of the loan fund committee, in addition to Mr. McKnight, are Dean Joseph W. Barker of the School of Engineering, Professor James P. Gifford of the School of Law, Professor Edgar J. Miller Jr. of the College of Physicians and Surgeons and W. Emerson Gentzler, secretary of appointments.

New Gain Reported In Fight on Cancer

Dr. Thompson Sees Encouragement In Work Of Two Experts

Distinct advances in the fight on cancer were reported on Oct. 6 by Dr. L. R. Thompson, Assistant Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, says a Washington dispatch to the New York Times. The description follows:

Chief developments are reported in work being carried on by Dr. Carl Voegtlin, Pharmacologist Director, who has been "breaking down" the formation of cells in malignant growths, and by Dr. J. W. Scherescheswsky, in charge of the department's cancer investigation at Harvard, who is working with X-ray.

Dr. Voegtlin believes that he is discovering means of nullifying these cell growths, while Dr. Scherescheswsky asserts that he has discovered in dibenzanthracene, a product derived from coal tar, one of the direct causes of cancer.

Dr. Voegtlin reports that he has followed his discovery of 1933—that lactic acid produced by malignant growths causes a pronounced development of the acidity in these same tissues—with a systematic study of the influence of variations in hydrogen ion concentration upon the composition of tissue.

Seeks Root of the Disease

Dropping the study of alleviating treatments for cancer, such as radium, which the French scientists, Madame Curie and her husband, held to check the growth of cancer of the skin, and the studies of Dr. Blair Bell of England, who recently announced that colloidal lead had an effect in treating cancer, Dr. Voegtlin has tried to get to the root of the disease by investigating the chemical compositions of body cells that cause cancer and trying to find how these compositions can be offset.

His report of definite progress in "breaking down" cell growth led Dr. Thompson to declare today there was reason to believe that discovery of the cause and cure of cancer was inevitable.

Claiming that "results clearly show that an increase in hydrogen ion concentration has an inhibiting effect upon provein synthesis (the formation of protein elements in the cells)" Dr. Voegtlin goes on to explain that "theoretically, this observation indicates the possibility, if not the likelihood, of the coupling of at least three fundamental processes" in the formation of cell growths.

Three Processes Linked

The three biochemical processes in cell growth linked by Dr. Voegtlin are proteolysis, glycolysis and oxidation reduction. The first relates to the breaking down of proteins into diffusible bodies, the second to the formation of sugar in the cells.

"This interrelation is probably of importance for the regulation of the chemistry of the cell and has interesting implications as regards malignant growths," Dr. Voegtlin reports.

"Experiments were also made to ascertain whether the resynthesized protein had the same quality as the original one. Quantitative estimations of the crystine content confirm this view."

Dr. Voegtlin held that "the observed resynthesis of protein is due to the presence of an intracellular enzyme and that it is not due to a non-enzymic exidation of protein cleavage products.

An Enviable Scholastic Record

Having completed 21 years of schoolwork at the age of 21 during which time she obtained three college degrees, is the remarkable record of Miss Lucille Emerick of Du Bois, Pa., Miss Emerick completed her grammar, elementary and high school courses in 1929, covering 12 years work. In 1932 she had completed a 4-year course at a music conservatory and obtained a Bachelor of Music degree. In February 1934 she completed a four-year course at New York University with a degree of Bachelor of Science, and by June 1934, she had covered another year of post-graduate work and obtained a M.A. degree.

Prince To Become German Soldier

Hubertus Gets Approval Of Kaiser To Be 1st Of House In Reich Army

Prince Hubertus of Prussia, the third son of the former Crown Prince, has obtained his grandfather's permission to join the German Army, according to recent Berlin dispatch to the New York Times. He will be the first member of the Hohenzollern family to bear arms for the Third Reich.

Indirectly, two of his brothers already are indentified with the new regime, Wilhelm as a sub-leader of the Stahlhelm, or Steel Helmets, an integral part of Chancellor Hitler's political army, and Louis Ferdinand as a pilot in the Air Defense Union, of which Hermann Wilhelm Goering, the Air Minister, is the chief.

The commitment of the two older brothers, however, is not much more than that of every German subject. Hubertus, by joining the Reichswehr, might theoretically be ordered by Chancellor Hitler to suppress a monarchist plot.

In giving permission for his grandson's step the former Kaiser said he had been actuated by the idea that the Hohenzollerns had always prided themselves on being good soldiers and loyal servants of the State.

Hubertus, who is 25 years old, made a trip to Africa in 1932 with Archduke Friedrich Franz of Mecklenburg to study the possibilities of German emigration. He speaks English and French excellently and is a good mixer.

It was recalled, in view of the step to be taken by Hubertus, that when his brother Wilhelm participated in maneuvers of the Reichswehr in 1926 as a guest and observer, republican feeling still ran so high that the late Field Marshal Paul von Hindenburg had to discharge the chief of staff, General Hans von Seeckt, as being responsible for permitting the Prince's attendance.

Louis Ferdinand, who recently returned from the United States, departed from Berlin for Doorn, the Netherlands, where he will pay a brief visit to his grandfather and then resume the flying course he has been taking near Munich.

IS CLUB SPEAKER

Miss Barbara Werthmein, niece of the United States Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., and granddaughter of the former American Ambassador to Turkey, Mr. Henry Morgenthau, Sr., was the speaker at the meeting of the Tokyo Women's club at the Y.W.C.A. today.

Barbara Werthmein

Miss Werthmein gave an instructive address on the organization and work of the Institute of Pacific Relations with which she was connected in New York for a year and for which she has come to Tokyo to do research work.

She declared that the institute is unique in that it is the only unofficial organization engaged to study international problems on an international basis.

Another remarkable fact about the institute is that while it studies the economic, political, and educational problems of Pacific countries, it is entirely free of all propaganda. The reports which the institute makes from time to time, therefore, are highly regarded from the standpoint of truth.

So that it never can be suspected of propaganda taint, the Institute of Pacific Relations never gives an opinion, never passes resolutions, nor draws up a policy. It merely finds and publishes the facts for the general public.

Organized in 1925, Miss Werthmein said that the institute had already has notable achievements.

"Although education is the least important of its problems," Miss Werthmein stated, "it is striving to have better information on the history and the culture of the Orient introduced in textbooks of the Occident. The institute believes the sections on the Orient in textbooks of the Pacific coast states can not only be larger but more accurate. It also aims to have more courses on the Orient given in colleges and universities and already this is being and has been done.

"But our economic problems are the most important. They include such topics as the Japanese Migration, the land utilization in China, and a comparison of the standard of living in the Pacific countries. We are working on this last topic at present. The topic of Japanese migration includes the movements to the Hawaiian islands, to Chosen, and to other sections.

"Our political study embraces the changing balance of power in the Pacific, the naval disarmament, and the relations between countries."

Miss Werthmein declared the work was carried on in two ways, by conferences held every two years and by research and publication of that research. As well as the workers or consuls in every country, laymen are invited to attend the conferences. The program of each conference is prepared long in advance so when the delegates arrive, they are ready for intelligent discussion, she said. Round tables are conducted by experts and their findings are published.

Miss Werthmein declared the organizations mazagine, "Pacific Affaires," which is now being published in New York as a quarterly under the editorship of Mr. Owen Lattimore, has become less of a house organ than formerly and is now a magazine of first rank.

During the last year, she aided in compiling some of the research work that was done for the book, "Economic Handbook of the Pacific," which was put out by the American consul under the editorship of Fredrick Field, and also for the book, "Empire of the East," by Joseph Barnes.

The meeting of the Tokyo Women's club was held under the auspices of the extension committee.

Prof. Ryoichi Taoka of the Tohoku Imperial University, will also speak on the mandatory rule in Palestine. Impromptu acts were performed by Baroness Togo and her son, Mrs. Gomez, Mrs. Ruth and Miss Ruth, Lefty Gomez Mrs. McNair and Mr. Miller.

PROGRAM GIVEN

Displaying dramatic skill as well as mastery of English, members of the Semmonbu English Speaking Society of the Tokyo Commercial University Saturday and Sunday evenings gave an interesting program of two plays and addresses.

Mr. Masakazu Ishikawa welcomed the audience on behalf of the society following which the melodrama, "Autocrat of the Coffee Stall" was given by Shozo Uenishi, Takeo Takata, Ren Kaneko, Seiji Chiba, Toshio Tamaki, and Masakazu Ishikawa, all of whom showed themselves capable actors.

Mr. Seisuke Nakamura traced Japan's trade expansion and outlined its future following which "Journey's End" was given by Sansuke Imamura, Yoshikazu Hatanaka, Eijiro Machida, Kazuyuki Suzuki, Daikichi Yagi, Shigehisa Aoyagi, Shunichi Kohda, Tetuzaburo Shimada, Makoto Ogura, Seiji Chiba, Yasuo Mishima, and Kaoru Kobayashi.

Though the students had the double difficulty of giving a heavy play in a foreign language, they distinguished themselves by appearing at ease and as master of both "problems."

HONORED BY MEXICO

Dr. Miguel Alonzo-Romero, the Mexican Minister to Japan, acting in the name of the President of Mexico, Sunday bestowed distinct honors on four well-known Japanese.

He conferred the Mexican Order of the Aztec Eagle upon Mr. Kumaichi Horiguchi, Colonel Yoshio Wada, Captain Kohei Ochi, and Lieutenant Colonel Saburo Isoda. Others present were Admiral Moriyama, Mr. Takeo Yamagata, Mr. Takemaro Kobayashi and several members of the Mexico-Japan Society.

The Mexican Order of the Aztec Eagle was created a year ago with the view of honoring foreigners who have earned Mexico's recognition for their achievements in favor of Mexico. The decorations of the order can be given to foreigners only.

HAS RELAPSE

Mr. Iwajiro Yasuda, who was recovering from an extended illness, has suffered a relapse.

BALL PLAYERS HONORED

More than 160 persons have made reservations for the dinner dance which the American Association will give for the visiting American baseball players at the Imperial hotel this evening. Mr. John Curtis will preside and talks will be given by several of the players, including Babe Ruth. Mr. J. D. Blake has been in charge of reservations.

Mexico's Reform To Force Socialistic Education

moral education and the conscience of our children, trying to deal a death blow to the family, and trying to deal a death blow to private property," the union urges parents to prepare for any kind of sacrifices, even fines and jail sentences, to carry out the proposed permanent student strike, and adds:

"The conscientious parent should be resolved to lose even his life to save the intellectual, moral and social integrity of his children!"

Meanwhile the Government resolutely pursues its policy of more and more restricting not only church influences in school and family but in the matter of worship. Practically every state in the country has severely restricted the number of priests permitted to hold service and the number of churches (constitutionally government property) being closed and converted to school, library or other uses, continues to mount rapidly.

Clerical Groups Blamed

Nor do the administration and its leaders mince words about their conception of the church's role in Mexican history. Political Dictator Plutarco Elias Calles, former president, recently blamed "clerical and capitalistic' groups for political unrest in northern Mexico. Luis Leon, editor of the government El Nacional, in a recent speech, synthesized the situation:

"Some foreign nations do not understand our clerical problem because in their countries religions is not utilized as a banner nor as a political weapon. In Mexico our history shows that religion has always been the standard behind which expliciters of the nation seek refuge and for that reason the problem of the clergy is a political and social problem in our country; a problem which people should confront with all its effort during the next presidential term in order to reach a solution once and for all."

From the other side of the political walls from the radical non-government groups who see the Government's program as "bolstering Capitalism" the criticism of "Fascism" is hurled at the National Revolutionary Party. Public meetings, debates, student strikes, newspaper polemics everywhere keep alive the burning question of Socialistic education. There are few who will deny that the reform proposed is the most significant since that of 1857 when education was declared a function of the State and not of the Church.

Eckener Ready To Start 'Graf' Line To The U.S.

and economy of the airship in commercial transoceanic aviation. But he devoted most of his time and emphasis to the questions of safety, of reliability and of securing competent personnel which were raised so graphically by the Akron tragedy.

He then offered to put the new German giant airship—now nearing completion at Friedrichshaven—in the north Atlantic run for an experimental period next summer to demonstrate to American air officials the practicability of such a service provided they would do two things. One, make the navy's hangar at Lakehurst available, and two, construct a mooring mast somewhere between Lakehurst and Miami, for emergency landings.

He also offered to cooperate with the American industry in training crews and officers to man American-built dirgibles.

The most damning charge against giant airships raised by the Akron tragedy was that such ships were too flimsy and too clumsy to weather the storms which it would have to meet in regular commercial service. Dr. Eckener met this with a long and detailed account of his personal experiences with storms in the Graf Zeppelin. His conclusion was that "under competent command an airship is able to cope with all weather conditions and all situations."

He recognized, of course, that it would have to detour some storm conditions such as a hurricane, just as would a water-borne ship. But he insisted that an airship would "always" be able to do this "if properly guided."

He considered serious storms, which disrupt airplane service, of no danger at all to airships. The only real menace, he said, was a "line squall." But he felt that an airship properly handled could go through one safely if its schedule required. He recounted several instances where he had done so in the Graf Zeppelin.

Laughs at Storms

At this juncture, he pointed out that it is so-called "storms" frequent in the north Atlantic which fliers. Since the airship does not are so dreaded by heavier-than-air fear storms, he considered the north Atlantic run to be just as feasible for this type of ship as the south Atlantic course it now takes on its customary schedule. In fact, he implied that the "squall," which it does fear to some extent, is more frequent in the south Atlantic.

"An airship service over the north Atlantic can be operated with the same safety and regularity as the service we have now been operating for a period of four years to South America," he concluded on this point.

As for the personnel problem, he estimated that one year would be sufficient time to train a crew and three years to give an officer sufficient experience to handle a ship with complete safety—provided that the officer was flying constantly during the three-year period. He implied that the Navy's system of transferring its officers back and forth between airship and regular seagoing service was not the proper method of developing an efficient aircraft personnel.

Skeptics about airships have been accustomed to say in official quarters here lately that Dr. Eckener himself is the only living individual competent to handle airships safely. The German skipper takes quite a different position.

Bishops In Favor Of Birth Control By 44 to 38 Vote

Protestant Episcopal Church Liberal Bloc Overrides Conservative Clergy

Birth control won the tacit approval of the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church on Oct. 20 at Atlantic City when the liberal and low church bishops combined to force approval of a resolution indorsing dissemination of birth control information.

Overriding the conservatives, including the presiding bishop, the Most Rev. James De Wolf Perry, and Bishop William T. Manning, of New York, the liberal bloc brought one of the most surprising upsets in the history of the Church, says the Christian Science Monitor. By a vote of 44 to 38 the bishop approved the following resolution:

"We indorse the efforts now being made to secure for licensed physicians, hospitals and medical clinics freedom to convey such information as is in accord with the highest principles of eugenics and a more wholesome family life wherein parenthood may be undertaken with due respect for the health of the mother and the welfare of the children."

Influence on Congress

Should the resolution pass the House of Deputies, many clergymen undoubtedly will hail the victory as a powerful indorsement of birth control legislation, which regularly comes before the United States Congress and is persistently defeated in committee.

So tense was the session that the Right Rev. Paul Matthews, Bishop of New Jersey, threatened "to leave this house forever" when a motion to limit debate was proposed. Other bishops were equally outspoken. Scornfully, the Right Rev. Simeon Arthur Huston. Bishop of Olympia, Wash., dismissed obections to birth control as "a lot of pious twaddle from celibate clergymen."

Bishop Mathews, a staunch conservative, rose trembling with indignation when the Right Rev. Hiram Hulse, Bishap of Cuba, proposed that each speaker be limited to one and one-half minutes.

Objects to Indorsement

"Mr. President, this is a parliamentary outrage of the first order," he cried. "If you try to stop this debate I shall leave this house forever."

It was recalled that Bishop Matthews strode indignantly from the Lambeth Conference in London four years ago when the birth control issue was brought up.

The Bishop was still agitated when he took the floor against the resolution.

"I admit," he said, "that certain restrictions are justified to protect the health of mothers. But we are now asked to indorse birth control, which is illegal in the United States. The persons who would benefit by this sort of thing would be the manufacturers of contraceptive devices.

"Our homes will be flooded by literature describing these devices. If you have ever been in London you have seen the stores which we call 'drug stores' with whole windows devoted to the display of them.

Huston Scorns "Pious Twaddle"

"When the people of the Church believe that the moral leadership of the Church has gone so far astray as to give the impression that we are in favor of something to promote promiscuity and to further degrade our youth, it is a question whether they will feel that their allegiance does not lie higher."

Leading the supporters of birth control was Bishop Huston, author of the resolution.

"I did not come 3,000 miles across the United States to appear as an arch-propagandist for what may be called birth control," he explained. "But I insist, gentlemen, that we cannot find the necessity for such action by looking through stained glass windows. We must go into the streets and into the homes of the poor.

"We have had a lot of pious twaddle from celibate clergymen who are about as far from knowledge of the realities of life as the man in the moon."

Up spoke the Right Rev. Thomas Jenkins, Bishop of Nevada, who is identified with the high church wing.

"I am not a celibate," he protested. "I raised seven children on a small salary."

Vice and gambling flourished in Nevada because they were sanctioned by law, said Bishop Jenkins. "The morals of Nevada are the morals of the frontier," he said. "If you want to protect our boys and girls, defeat this resolution."

U.S. Lines To Award Medals For Heroism

The board of directors of the United States Lines have decided to award a gold medal of merit to men in the company's employ who render distinguished service involving great heroism or other outstanding qualifications, it was announced recently, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

'Zion Protocols' Assailed in Trial Started at Berne

Alleged Jewish Plot Laid To Plagiarism From Famous Essay

A lawsuit opened at Berne, Switzerland on October 29, according to a special dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor, in which Jewish leaders hope to prove to the world the alleged falsity of mystic documents painting Israel as seeking to dominate all the races of the earth.

It is hoped to establish that these documents, known as the "protocols of the Elders of Zion," painting Jewry as seeking world hegemony, are forged and false.

The Swiss Nazi Party, with Chancellor Hitler in the background as the driving force, is alleged to have deliberately plagiarized a famous French essay written in the epoch of Napoleon to prove that Jewry had ambitions vaster than ever dreamed of by either Napoleon the Great or Napoleon III, who proclaimed himself Emperor of France.

These documents, it is alleged, have gained world-wide distribution and in them the Nazis have twisted the "yellow peril," watchword of the former Kaiser, into the "Jewish peril."

Made By Russians

Sergius Swatikow, who served as the Vice-Governor of St. Petersburg (now Leningrad) under the Kerensky regime, declared in court today that the so-called "Protocols of the Elders of Zion" were fabricated by secret Russian agents at the French National Library.

Mr. Swatikow said that when he began to disband the Tsar's secret police, Henri Bind, a Frenchman and one of Russia's secret police agents, told him the protocols were prepared by General Rachowsky, supposed to be the head of the Tsar's secret police in Paris, with the aid of a man named Golowynsky, an agent provocateur, and expert librarian.

Denial In August

During the World Jewish Conference at Geneva last August sinister rumors were circulated that Jewry sought to create a super-government. The reports were stigmatized as outrageous by Rabbi Wise of New York, who compared the rumors to the falsity of the notorious protocols of the elders of Zion.

The rumors could not be brought to trial, but the allegedly spurious protocols form the basis of the present lawsuit.

The Union of Jewish Communities in Switzerland and the Jewish Community of Berne lodged a civil complaint against the leaders of the Swiss Nazis and others. They demand confiscation of a pamphlet newspaper and especially of the "protocols" as being in violation of the Swiss law prohibiting the printing of trashy literature "calculated to excite vile instincts or to cause brutal offense."

Famous Dialogue

The plaintiffs claim the publications are plagiarisms of the celebrated "Dialogue in Hades between Machiavelli and Montesquieu," written in 1864 by the French lawyer Maurice Joly against the dictatorship of Napoleon III.

The pretended secrets of the "Elders of Zion" were first published in 1905 in the Russian language by one Nilus.

The Jewish leaders claim the differences in the texts of Joly's essays and the fiery Zionist "Protocols" are but the slightest, and that plagiarists substituted the Jewish elders for Machiavelli, who speaks in the name of Napoleon.

In his original essay Joly, through the voice of Montesquieu, great French philosopher and contemporary of Jean Jacques Rousseau, defends an oppressed people against the despotism of Napoleon, who in the protested publications is transformed into the Jewish elders.

The "Plan"

The striking points of the "Protocols," like those of the July essay, are the necessity of having a muzzled press, a "hierarchy administration similar to the Roman Empire," with the removal of all private initiative and personal liberties.

"The greatest secret is to make use of popular prejudices and passions so as to create confusion and prevent accord among peoples of the same language interests," says the dialogue.

Another Hades conversation, transformed into a Jewish edict, according to Jewish leaders, advocates a powerful army "which will grow strong through foreign wars."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Authentic Tree of Knowledge

The Garden of Eden is now believed to have stood on the site of the city of Kurnah, lying at the confluence of the two great rivers Euphrates and Tigris in Irak Arabi. The river formed by this confluence is called Shott el Arav and flows through several mouths into the Persian Gulf.

This city of the Paradise still contains the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil which tempted Adam and Eve in their desire of eternal wisdom. When I was in Kurnah last year I saw the Tree and found it to be an ancient stump. Not far is the the city of Basra in which dwelt Sindbad the Sailor of te Arabian Nights.

The Most Costly Billiard Game in History

The Elector Maximilian II Emanuel of Bavaria was an extravagant pleasure-loving lord, passionately addicted to games for high stakes.

In the archives of the Bavarian Estates repose the vouchers for an afternoon of billiards which the Elector played with his chamberlain Barthelemy on July 1, 1701. In 15 games of trueq the Duke lost $3,600,000 to his partner. Only part of this loss was ever made good. The Duke was endlessly dunned for the payment of the balance. After his death, the Bavarian Estates refused to pay $2,000,000 remaining unpaid. The reason given was that the game had plunged the country into an abyss of misery in forcing the Duke to bleed his subjects white by taxation.

High Praise Is Lavished On Play Based On Rothschild

"Rothschild Won at Waterloo," a play by Eberhard Wolfgang Moller, just presented on several provincial stages, has been received with high praise by the critics, who see in Herr Moller, still a young dramatist, one of the white hopes of the German drama.

He has had several plays produced during the past few years, two of them dealing with money-power themes: "The Californian Tragedy" and "The Panama Scandal." His new play deals with an ambitious theme, how the Jewish banker, Nathan Rothschild, built up his tremendous fortune.

Basing his play on the famous legend which connects this London member of the Frankfurt Jewish banking family with Waterloo, Herr Moller has produced a dramatic parable on the villainous Jew financier as seen through the eyes of a modern Nazi.

In six short acts Herr Moller retells the legend. Accompanied by his book-keeper. O'Pinnel, Nathan Rothschild watches Wellington fight the decisive battle at Waterloo. When Blucher's Prussian soldiers arrive, he realizes that Wellington will win, and, riding to Brussels, he catches a coach to Ostend, where he is able to find sailors willing, for a suitable financial reward, to brave the Channel storm.

Rothschild arrives in London one day before the official courier, and at the Stock Exchange causes a panic by spreading the false report that Napoleon has won the battle of Waterloo. Meanwhile his agents buy up all the falling bonds, and when news of Napoleon's defeat arrives and sends them sky-high he makes a cool million pounds.

Nazi critics say that the play unveils the filthy machinations of the Jewish financial speculators and war profiteers. Rothschild, to them, is the incarnation of a Weltanschauung, which replaces the idea of Blood and Soil with Money and Power.

Swing to Right Taken by Labor Party in Britain

Property Confiscation And Representation In Commons Disapproved

Two decisions, both strengthening the more conservative element in British Labor Party were taken at this year's annual conference of that body at Southport, England, says a London dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor.

One is to favor no confiscation of property without fair compensation. The other is to debar the secretary of the party from membership of the House of Commons.

In the past one of the chief criticism of the British Labor Party has been that its policy was one of spoilation. This body's adoption of the Socialist creed of state ownership and managership of public untilities and key industries was responsible for this charge. This was because the left-wing view prevailed that expropriation should allow little or no compensation to those dispossessed by the state. The present decision is taken to mean that the more conservative element is gaining control.

Expediency Motive

The reasons which have prevailed have been ones of expediency. Mr. H. B. Lees-Smith, ex-Labor Minister of Education, put the case clearly at the conference. He held that continued acceptance of the left wing view would lose the next election. "You would go before the country at the next election," he declared, "and say that within a month you would confiscate one-half to two-thirds of the property of the shareholders throughout the country." Shareholders would withdraw their funds. There would be a run on the banks. Labor would have no prospects of success.

The decision taken by the conference to exclude the secretary of the party from the House of Commons raises a different point. The decision applies to the secretary about to be appointed to succeed Mr. Arthur Henderson, M. P., who is resigning after being for 23 years one of the most influential forces in the Labor movement.

Control of Funds

The change has been made at the instance of the Trades Unions, whoch provide most of the campaign funds for the Labor Party. The Trades Unions want to retain control of the party funds to an extent that they found impossible when a political leader like Mr. Henderson, was in charge of the money chest. The effect nevertheless, Labor M. P's. say, may be the reverse of what the Trades Unions expect. This is because a secretary outside Parliament has less influence over Labor M.P.'s than if he were one of themselves.

The authority he thus loses is expected to pass to the political leader, who is now likely to be Mr. Herbert Morrison, a strong right wing Socialist with no direct relation to the Trades Unions.

Nebraska Puts Iowa State Into Beaten Ranks, 7-6

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

LINCOLN, Neb., Oct. 27.—Nebraska's sophomores blasted Iowa State out of the undefeated football list today but a brilliant last-quarter cyclone rally forced the cornhuskers to accept a 7-to-6 victory before 28,000 fans.

Iowa State swept seventy-four yards in four plays against the wind in the last quarter and then Harold Miller, 155-pound quarterback who had accounted for seventy-two of the yards, smashed the Nebraska defense for a touchdown. Fred Poole's try for the extra point went wide.

France Relying On Doumergue To Avert Strife

Thinks Loss Of Premier's Services Would Cause Civil, Then Foreign War

Perhaps nowhere in the world is a better example to be found of the risks and inconveniences of a political leader's being at heart a confirmed exponent of democracy, a realistic practitioner of democratic methods and ideology, than in France. Nor are the dangers and ingratitudes incurred by an uncompromising adherence to Republican principles anywhere more apparent, says Leland Stowe in a Paris despatch dated Oct. 27 in the New York Herald-Tribune.

Doumergue

Among present national leaders, Premier Gaston Doumergue stands out as one of the very few who are dedicated to curing his country's ills by purely constitutional measures, based on approval from the people's elected representatives, yet because of that very fact, or possibly in spite of it, the French Premier is being subjected to bitter attack.

His program for constitutional reforms, which would increase the government's power and liberate it from the demagogic practices of the pork barrel, is being opposed—in the name of liberty—by politicians and parties who claim to love nothing more dearly than the Third Republic.

Argue Over Unused Power

This week the French Senate's graybeards emerged in opposition to Premier Doumergue simply because they wished to retain one privilege, the right of dissolution of the Chamber, which they have not exercised in sixty years. Quite justly, Doumergue relied: "At bottom I am the last defender of the constitution." Quite justly, too, "Intransigeant" warned, "infallably a dictatorship will come if Doumergue is overthrown, and disorder and riots will sweep the country."

In fact, the very parties who have most to lose if France is precipitated into quasi-Fascism are those who raise the most academic objections to the few simple constitutional reforms which might give France a stable government and the possibility of saving the Third Republic from very black and dangerous days.

Six months ago those foreign correspondents who described France as entering an extremely critical period, in which the very foundations of her democratic regime might be shaken, evoked a certain amount of official disapproval. Since then times have changed. Today the Premier of France himself warns cryptically that the nation now has to choose between the support of his reform program and the serious risk of a civil war which, so he says, would lead to a foreign war.

Foreign observers have perhaps been more restrained about using the phrase "civil war" than leaders of the government are themselves. In any case, that danger is not beyond the realm of possibility.

Doumergue Only Real Hope

What M. Doumergue proposes to do is reinforce the republic against chaos and collapse by strictly constitutional, democratic measures. But to achieve even that only the greatest personal courage in the face of the politicians' prejudices and selfish party ambitions can succeed.

It is by no means certain that it will succeed, but the personal integrity and unquestioned public interest of this septuagenarian, 100 per cent Republican, constitute the one real hope for salvation.

This is why France today offers the spectacle of an embattled democracy which, despite its limitations and the encumbrance of human short-sightedness, is still dedicated to a valiant fight to preserve both the principles and the practice of representative government, free and untrammeled. This drama must be decided in no small measure before next spring. It may come to a showdown at any moment after Parliament reconvenes November 6.

And it is by no means of importance to France alone. The great democracies of the world are now France, England and the United States. It would be a cruel blow indeed, and psychologically a most disturbing event, should French democracy fail to outride the crisis.

Donoghue Fetes 50th Birthday

Holds Informal Celebration At London Hotel; 30 Years A Jockey

Renge

LONDON, Nov. 9—Steve Donoghue has just celebrated his 50th birthday. He had an informal gathering at a London hotel at which his mother, his daughter Kathleen, his son Pat and the latter's wife were present.

For 30 years Donoghue has been riding regularly and the cry "Come on, Steve" has become so familiar to all classes of people, whether interested in racing or not, that it looks like going down in history in company with other famous expressions.

In his time Donoghue has been associated with nearly all the big racehorses of the present century. He won the Derby twice during the War when it was run at Newmarket, in 1915 and 1917. He won again at Epsom with Humorist in 1921, winning also in the following two years with Captain Cuttle and Papyrus. He was also successful in 1925 on Manna.

He has headed the winning jockey's list ten times in succession, once sharing this honor with C. Elliott, in 1923.

Donoghue recently stated that he did not intend to retire from racing for several years to come.

British Women's Council Approves Divorce Reform

Mothers' Union Minority Opposes Resolution On Voluntary Sterilization

Members of the National Council of Women of Great Britain voted in favor of divorce law reform and of a measure legalizing voluntary sterilization, when they met here under the presidency of the Dowager Lady Nunburnholme early in October. But they did not vote unanimously, says a dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor from Edinburgh.

Unanimity was hardly to be expected. The Council represents upwards of 2,000,000 women voters; and since, during the 39 years of its existence, it has pursued the "open-door" policy to women of all opinions—social, political, religious—it happens that, when controversial questions arise in open session, they seldom meet with an easy reception.

Controversy is regarded by the Council, however, less as a forerunner of disintegration than as a symptom of healthy growth. As one of the 300 delegates put it, "If we did not disagree so heartily, we should cease to be of the slightest use."

Controversy Expected

It was taken in thorough good part, therefore, when differences arose over the matter to the reform of the divorce laws, and when argument lasted so long and so vehemently over the question of the possible legalization of voluntary sterilization that time ran out and the matter had to be postponed for its settlement until the following day.

The question of the divorce laws was put forward by the National Council for Equal Citizenship and had an unflinching champion in Mrs. Helena Normanton who, because she is herself a barrister-at-law with experience of the ways of divorce courts, supports wholeheartedly the proposal that "the grounds for divorce for both husband and wife shall include adultery, desertion after three years, persistent cruelty, habitual drunkenness, incurable insanity after five years' confinement, or imprisonment under commuted death sentence" and that "all inequalities between men and women under matrimonial law shall be removed."

Vote Carried

The British law as it stands at present, Mrs. Normanton pointed out, encourages immorality by allowing divorce only in cases where adultery has been proved; and the fact that it so stands, after years of effort spent in attempting to shake it, is due, she said, to qualms based upon theological grounds and to that "curious public apathy" which so often blocks reform.

Mrs. Normanton carried her argument. A considerable majority of the delegates voted in favor. But the representative of the Mothers Union—an organization which numbers some half million women—asked to be disassociated from the whole question.

The Mothers' Union opposed too the resolution which dealt with the sterilization of the unfit, and was joined in its opposition by the delegates of numerous other societies on what they described as "religious grounds."

Their opposition did not, however, block the ultimate passage of the resolution, and the Council, after long and lively debate, went on record as supporting in general the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on Sterilization in its advocacy of voluntary sterilization for mental defectives, carriers of grave physical disabilities, and likely transmitters of mental disorder.

Other matters were of a less controversial nature. The Council delegates asked that a woman should be appointed as Assistant commissioner of His Majesty's Prisons. They asked that the hours and conditions of juveniles in "unregulated trades" should be regulated by law. They asked that the Government should remove the embargo upon new nursery schools and urged local authorities to reserve sites for such schools in new and recondtioned housing areas.

The Fatal Puzzle

Homer, the great epic poet of Greece once beheld some fishermen of his native Chios, on the west coast of Asia Minor as they returned from a day's work in the Aegean. He inquired whether they had had a successful day, to which one of the fishermen retorted: "What we caught we threw away, what we could not catch we kept." The poet puzzled over the meaning of his inability to guess the nature of the catch. Poor Homer! The answer is FLEAS.

A Marvelous Monument to Ingenuity

In 1802 George Bendotes, a published of Vienna, Austria, published a book containing a poem or 160 pages each line of which was a perfect palindrome. The author's name was Ambrose Hierorona-chus Pacperes. The title page contained a suggestion that the book will prove very useful to those who will studiy it deeply. During my several trips to Vienna, I have tried to secure a copy of this incredible tour de force. Unfortunately the book is now out of print.

Diamonds In World Weigh Over 50 Tons

Value Of Cut Stones Placed At $70,000,000,000

On women's necks and fingers, in the treasure stores of Indian princes; and in bank vaults and family safes, there are to-day more than fifty tons of cut diamonds.

This immense quantity of precious stones owned by the general public throughout the world, weighs approximately 250 million carats and is valued at nearly 70,000,000,000 dollars.

"These figures may sound enormous," Mr. Johan J. Smit, the Amsterdam diamond dealer, told the United Press, "but they are not out of proportion. The industry employs more than 500,000 men in the mining districts; 25,000 cutters throughout the world; 10,000 dealers in unset stones, and probably another 100,000 in jewellers shops.

"People are buying diamonds again," continued Mr. Smit. "Although the market for big stones is still somewhat limited, since the depression, the sale of small diamonds is increasing. For one thing they are cheap now, and form a good investment."

Another boon to the diamond trade is its increasing use by industry. Electrical works, automobile factories, and various other industrial concerns employ diamonds for grinding and drilling. For these purposes the best type of stone is required.

The general public, however is still the largest buyer, and its taste in diamonds varies according to countries.

Labor Body Plans US Seat At Geneva

Director Of International Office To Make Arrangements With American Body

The governing body of the International Labor Office ended its September session by giving its director, Harold Beresford Butler, full power to negotiate with Washington relative to American membership in this autonomous section of the League of Nations. Mr. Butler left recently for the United States on the invitation of the American Federation of Labor at its San Francisco covention, says the New York Times.

Among the questions Mr. Butler will take up with the Washington administration are its representation in the International Labor Office's governing body and conference, the appointment of American citizens as permanent I. L. O. officials and the United States Government's financial contribution.

The main thing in the first question is what government now enjoying a permanent seat in the governing body shall renounce its place in favor of the United States. There is no doubt here that the United States eventually will get in but doubt as to who will get out. The Canadian Government, which had formerely intimated it would renounce its seat, now demurs.

The governing body named a committee consisting of its chief officers to consider who should withdraw and will determine the question by deciding which member is the least important industrially.

The American delegate to the governing body will, of course, be named independently by Washington, but the permanent staff of I. L. O. officials is appointed by Mr. Bulter. It is expected that he will fill two high posts, as well as several less important ones, with Americans after consulting Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins.

It is not known what the United States proposes to pay as a member, but it has always been assumed she would pay no less than Great Britain, whose annual contribution totals 800,000 gold frnacs.

Representation in the workers' and employers' sections of the governing body is arranged respectively by the workers and employers, and no trouble is anticipated in arranging permanent American representation. It is understood the Canadian workers' seat will go to the United States.

The governing body, before adjourning until January, decided to keep alive the question of the forty-hour week, which fell down in the last conference, by putting it on the conference agenda for next June.

Capt. Tarabotto's Character Closely Woven With Rex

Patrician Figures Sees All, Knows All Aboard Palatial Italian Liner

Captain Francesco Tarabotto, skipper of the Italian palatial liner Rex, is a business man afloat, seeing all and knowing all aboard his vessel, according to Mr. George Horne, who has written the following story in a recent issue of the New York Times.

When one sees Captain Francesco Tarabotto standing on the towering bridge of the liner Rex there is an impression of something definitely missing. That patrician figure should be wrapped in a toga. He is a man built for the dimensions of the fastest ship in the world. Six feet two, broad, almost massive, his dark features grace well the mistress of the seas, the ribbon-holder of the Atlantic.

It is doubtful if there is any ship on any sea whose character is so inextricably woven with the identity of the skipper. Franceso Tarabotto is the Rex; the Rex is Tarabotto. He is no distant tycoon directing the flesh and steel of a mobile city, no aloof mediator between 3,000 souls and the sea's inclemency. Often the captain of a ship is a recluse; he paces the wide wings of his domain alone and except for occasional forays into his floating city's departments for routine supervision, keeps to his instruments and the inscrutable dreams that seamen have.

Captain Tarabotto, instead, is a modern business man, the chief executive of a high-powered industry that costs the Italian Government and the people plenty; a beloved white elephant bearing the same relationship every surperliner bears to the people it advertises.

Confers With Aides Daily

Every day Captain Tarabotto confers with the head of each department. His chief purser makes a series of appointments for him daily, and at a certain time every man on the ship gives an accounting of his talents. He must relate in detail the criticisms of passengers, if there be such, and the pecadillos of every employee.

And, withal, he is a man of vast tolerance despite his almost frightening personal perfection.

In the first place there is that disconcerting mustache and short beard, a general facial ensemble resulting in the classic appearance of a prophet. He never drinks, never smokes, and eats two pounds of fruit every morning. He shuns coffee and tea, except for a halfcup taken at noon just to show his fellow men he is really one of them. He smiles benignly and says: "It's just a habit of no habits, that's all."

To him the world begins at the bow of the Rex and ends at the graceful stern. It is laterally bounded by the sleek sides of the hull that every week carve pathways from Genoa to Ambrose Light. Unconsciously he has come to accept the word Rex as synonymous with the superlative. It is the Rex of this and the Rex of that. Rex peaches. Rex skies. Rex weather. The Rex of perfection. Captain Tarabotto cannot avoid it. And when his face lights up with a youthful enthusiasm for everything he does, no one could suspect him of any guile.

A Native of Lerici

Born in Lerici, Gulf of Spezia, in 1879, the master of the Italian Line's flagship (there is no title of commodore) followed his father and grandfathers to salt water. His grandfathers owned and captained sailing vessels, and each Summer, for being a "buon ragazzo" Francesco was taken to sea to learn the trade. He began these romantic vayages at 9, serving in every capacity available to one of his age. When he was 13 his father sent him to the Naval Institute at Genoa, where he received navigation papers in 1899. Until 1904 he went to sea "on my own" to gain experience and await the prescribed age of 24, the minimum for a master's ticket.

For two years he was on the Monte Moro, crossing once from Genoa to Sabine Pass, Texas, in fifty-four days. A far cry to the crossing last year when he stood on the bridge of the Rex and brought her across the Atlantic in four days, thirteen hours and fifty-eight minutes, a passage which shattered all records and entitled the ship to what had been a mythical blue ribbon.

But not mythical to the realistic Commandante Tarabotto. Today, in the navigation room, as handy as the charts, is an embossed mahogany chest sheltering a 60-foot pennant, a gorgeous silken affair with the word "Rex" in white letters along the staff end. The fluttering tip of this fabulous oriflamme streamed backward across the liner's stern on the day the record was sealed and the liner passed up the harbor amid the noisy din of saluting craft.

Tarabotto served in the Italian Navy in 1900 and the next year entered the employ of the N. G. I. Line as third officer on the old Roma. He became staff captain on the maiden voyage of the new liner Principessa Mafalda in the South American run, and after the war went back to this route as master of the same liner, which he describes as the "Rex of the N. G. I. fleet." He was shifted to the Genoa Pacific trade in 1926, and a few years later commanded his first ship to New York, the Duilio. His next was the liner Augustus, still the largest motorliner in the world, and in 1932 came the Rex.

Master Is a Bachelor

Captain Tarabotto is a bachelor, and if you ask him why, he smiles demurely and suggests that his only loves are the Rex and his dog Lily, an arrogant terrier who roams the bridge and the officers' quarters at her pleasure.

At 6:45 o'clock every morning the attendente, Emilio, brings in the night's news dispatches and the captain reads them all before his first visit to the bridge. After half an hour there he returns and eats his breakfast of fruit while the maitre d'hotel reports on the ship's service in every detail. He also decides on a list of prominent passengers for the diurnal noon reception. Many of the great of Europe and America have joined these esoteric noontime bands that are a sort of ritual on the Rex. Recently Cardinal Mundelein of Chicago was one of these and the prelate related how he had been asked by the Pope for the name of the ship that would carry him home. He told him.

"Very well my son," replied the Holy Father. "I know Captain Tarabotto, who once brought all his crew here to the Vatican." The Pope explained that a bond existed between the captain and himself, "for I, too, am a navigator, I steer the little boat of St. Peter, the boat also of a king of sky and earth."

After he had brought the sea laurels to Italy, Tarabotto and his men kneit for the Pope's blessing. The Pope decorated the captain with his gold medal for gallantry, the second ever awarded.

The captain spends the morning on the bridge and before the reception holds court with all his aides, the chief radio man, chief steward, chief purser, chief engineer, surgeon. He must know everything himself. He must know how much oil the ship has used in the last twenty-four hours. He must know if the lady in cabin C12 has recovered from her indigestion, and about when he will be expected to christen that new baby in third class. He keeps a regular schedule every day of every voyage, but no member of the crew can depend on absolute adherence to it. Likely as not, Tarabotto may throw the whole thing off schedule half an hour and suddenly appear, gentle and apostolic-looking, down in the third-class kitchen, or the special-class lounge to see if any one has forgotten the shadow of authority.

Usually no one forgets. Discipline is a high art on the Rex. Last week a recalcitrant service elevator, disabled probably by the anguished urging of the operator, simply refused to carry Captain Tarabotto to the top deck. The captain smiled, and the operator stared at the switch lever incredulously. It simply was not possible that an elevator dared rebel at such a time. After the captain had walked out of hearing distance this hernous sin was richly showered with epithets, and electricians came scurrying from below to overhaul the offending machine.

Crew Does Not Fear Him

Tarabotto's crew does not fear him. Their respect for his qualities is stronger than manufactured emotion, as strong as the heavy silver symbol lying on his table, the bound sticks and mace of fascism.

One black night during the war Captain Tarabotto was bringing 1,500 reserve troops from Brazil. He was following a secret course, but there was one man on board who wanted to know the course so badly he had brought along his own instruments for taking sights on the stars. Taking a late stroll about the deck that night, the captain saw the man taking sights behind one of the deck boats and writing figures in a little notebook.

The man insisted he was just amusing himself with a hobby, but Captain Tarabotto, in the politiest of terms, asked if he would mind going over his figures in the "brig" for the remainder of the voyage.

Once, on the Augustus, a young lady, who thought the sea calmer than her own life, dived overboard in the middle of the Atlantic. The captain turned his ship around and had rescued the woman in twenty-minutes. But for the passenger's pajamas it would have been quicker than hat. Observers on the bridge thought they saw two figures in the sea. They chased after one and came alongside only to discover their mistake. Filled with air, the lost pajamas had caught in the wind and were scudding away merrily with the liner in pursuit. The passenger returned to the liner sans pajamas, but with new theories about life.

The captain eats in the dining salon only with his officers. It is a rule of the liner that keeps captains and passengers apart at mealtime. It saves wear and tear on the captain's stories and keeps people from asking the skippers such questions as how they can guide a ship to a port where they've never been before.

Captain Tarabotto is a civil officer of Italy, and can arrest any one on the ship if in his judgment such action is justified, but he cannot marry two passengers unless one of them is dying and requests the ceremony.

Almost every movie star, actor, Cardinal, statesman, athlete or other prominent passenger adds a souvenir to the capain's roomful of mementos. One of his favorites, he says, is an inscribed wallet from "Douglas" Fairbanks. But, obviously, his favorite is a photograph of himself, with Dino Grandi and Italo Balbo. It is called "Three beards that conquered America."

Nazi Refugees From Austria Vex Yugoslavia

New Regency Faces Task Of Handling Hundreds, Many Women, At Border

Hundreds of Austrian Nazis, fearing reprisals by the auxiliary Fascist police in their homeland for the ill-fated putsch in July continue to flock to the refugee concentration camps in the little town of Varazdin in Yugoslavia.

Their presence within the realm of the boy king, Peter II, is one of the problems with which the new regency must deal, says a dispatch to the New York Times dated Oct. 20. The fact that they maintain contacts with comrades left behind is a problem for frontier guards of both Yugoslavia and Austria.

Word has come to Varazdin for example, that Mrs. Ehrhardt Hammerand, a former resident of St Louis, has been arrested in Vienna on charges of being a Nazi courier.

Women Set Up Own Camp

Many women have evaded the border guards, and now have a camp of their own near that established for men.

Two of them, one the mother of five children and the other the young friend of a putschist, told dramatic stories of their escape.

The girl refused to give her name for fear her family would suffer. Mrs. Emilie Beindl, however, brought her children with her, and her husband is already imprisoned in Austria.

"Gendarmes beat me terribly soon after the revolt," she said. "They said I had helped to gather arms for the fighting, but I told them the mother of five children would never engage in such activities."

"Three weeks later I was beaten by customs agents, who said they wanted to avenge a comrade who had been shot by a group of men which included my husband. I was afraid I would be killed if I remained in Austria.

"Besides, the repeated visits of armed men to my home at Ponisdorf, Burgenland, terrified my children.

"I sent the three oldest children ahead to cross the border alone. Then I walked through the woods at night into Yugoslavia, carrying my two youngest. The children became separated, and I did not know what had happened to them until we were all sent here by Yugoslav gendarmes. The children were so hungry that they made themselves ill by eating."

Three attempts were necessary before the nineteen-year-old girl who was afraid to give her name was able to cross the Styrian border.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

London Is Not The Capital of England

The real capital of England is neither Greater London, nor even the City of London proper, but the City of Westminster which includes the Law Courts, Imperial Institute, and Buckingham and St. James's Palaces. Westminster is bounded on the East by the City of London and both cities lie within the Metropolitan District of London County. Within the square mile which is the extent of the City of London, the Lord Mayor is King and rules with ancient pomp and ceremony. Where the Strand ends abruptly and Fleet Street begins, once stood Temple Bar, a famous gateway to the City. Even the King of England whenever he wishes to visit the City of London always stops at Temple Bar to ask formal permission of the Lord Mayor, before he may enter the Sovereign Square Mile.

TRANSLATED BY Eiichi Kiyooka

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY Shinzo Koizumi, President of Keio University

Here is the life of a great leader of new Japan who, in the age when Japan was in bewilderment with her ports suddenly visited by the Western peoples, taught her the true spirit of the Western civilization, and showed how this nation ought to be reorganized to meet the new age; and who made a fortune by simply being a successful writer—founded a university—also a newspaper—and financed them both single-handed. A loving father, a hearty friend, and a possessor of noble character. His name seems to hold a special meaning to all Japanese people.

Episcopal Bishops Score Dark Era

'Menace Of Reno,' Inadequate Social Order And Bad Books Listed In Pastoral Letter

A dark picture of the times was drawn at Atlantic City, N. J. on October 23 by the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in their inspiration message to the whole communion according to the New York Times. Dominating the picture were "the menace of Reno," "a wicked and adulterous generation," drama and literature that are "immoral and licentious," and an economic order of "lamentable inadequacy."

The reading of the pastoral letter by the Right Rev. James E. Freeman, Bishop of Washington, brought to a close the fifty-first triennial general convention of the church on its fourteenth day. The letter, the purpose of which is "to recall to our people the inspiring advances of the church in a triennium and to urge them on to a more zealous discipleship," will be read from every Protestant Episcopal pulpit within a month.

Message Sent to Roosevelt

A message of greeting to President Roosevelt, voted early in the convention, was telegraphed to him that night by the Right Rev. James De Wolf Perry, presiding Bishop, and the Rev. Ze Barney Thorne Philips, who gave out the following text:

"My Dear Mr. President:

"The members of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church assembled in Atlantic City have asked the presiding Bishop and the president of the House of Deputies to convey to you their greetings and the assurance of their prayers for God's guidance in the administration of your high office, and for His blessing upon your every effort to lead the people of the United States into the ways of prosperity and peace."

Pastoral Letter Read

"From our vantage point we make our reckoning of present trends and tendecies," the Bishops said in their pastoral letter. "Greed and selfishness, unrest, hunger and multiplied disorders, civil strife in cities and despair in the broad fields of agriculture grow apace, and the day of deliverance and renewed happiness and prosperity is long deferred.

"Our nation and the nations of the world are suffering from a moral sag that has reduced them to the low plane of impotence."

The Bishops see the New Deal made futile by this moral crisis, but, urging that the mission of the church be zealously maintained, they also "find hope in the situation."

"The most vital and fruitful periods in the church's history have been those where material values have suffered impairment and the genius of men has proved inadequate to meet critical situations," the letter said.

Of the manufacture of munitions the letter said that "for greed of gain and wickedness of design the industry has no parallel in modern times."

Peace Stand Reaffirmed

The unqualified stand against war taken in their Devenport pastoral letter last year was reaffirmed by the Bishops.

The Bishops advocated the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively; unemployment insurance and old-age pensions and the abolition of child labor.

About 800 persons attended the religious service at which the pastoral letter was read. Most of the delegates and Bishops had left at the close of the morning sessions.

Bishop Perry was attended at the service by a robed priest bearing the crozier. Other Bishops taking part were Bishop Paul Matthews of New Jersey, host to the convention, and Bishop Joseph Marshall Francis of Indianapolis. The Rev. Ze Barney Thorne Phillips, president of the House of Deputies and chaplain of the United States Senate, conducted the service.

The final sessions of the two houses were devoted to the finishing of business. The Bishops concurred in the election of Bishop Philip Cook of Delaware as president of the National Council, a new office created to ease the business burdens of the Presiding Bishop. It was announced that Bishop Henry Hobson of Southern Ohio had been elected chairman of the Forward Movement, a drive to "revitalize the church."

The deputies, having little business to do, sang hymns and told stories while waiting for the Bishops to adjourn. It was suggested that Rosewell Page, veteran delegate from Virginia, who offered the resolution, which was tabled, rebuking Bishop William T. Manning of New York for his "Catholic" sermon, and Clifford B. Morehouse, who led the fight to drop "Protestant" from the name of the church, should lead the house in singing "Blessed Be the Tie That Binds," and on that note the house adjourned.

Piccard's Ascent Into Stratosphere Ends On Treetops

Professor And Wife Are In Gondola As It Settles On An Ohio Farm

The stratosphere flight of the Jean Piccards, husband and wife, came to an end in a treetop on October 23 near Cadiz, Ohio. The bag of their balloon was badly torn, but the gondola and its valuable instruments were undamaged and the Piccards themselves were unhurt, The New York Times reported.

Saying they believed the purpose of their flight had been accomplished, the aeronauts and scientists brought the huge bag down after a flight that started from Detroit and carried them an estimated ten miles into the air.

"The flight was a success," said Mrs. Piccard, soon after she climbed from the gondola to an old logging road on the John Fulton farm, four and one-half miles south-west of Cadiz.

"I am certain the valuable instruments are not seriously injured," she said. "Failure of the sun's rays to penetrate caused the balloon to loose buoyancy and we had to make a landing.

Radio Communication Broken

"We did not know where we were. We had no radio communication of any kind after 8 A. M. Our last radio contact was with the Detroit Airport, by short wave. We were not cold at any time. The sun was shining brightly all the time. We saw nothing of the earth until we landed."

Mrs. Piccard and her husband donned football helmets just before the gondola struck the tree-tops. The helmets had been taken for protection in just such an emergency.

Mrs. Piccard's first remark was facetious.

"Oh, dear," she said, "I wanted to land on the White House lawn." The possibility of such a landing had been the subject of much banter before the take-off.

She insisted on finding "fleur de lys," the tiny turtle that had been the mascot of the flight. It was found to have survived the bumpy landing.

The Piccards encountered poor visibility from the start, they said. Two farmers, A. C. Porter and Dan Ross, were among the first to reach the balloon after it landed. They quoted the Piccards as saying the temperature inside the balloon got below 58 degrees Fahrenheit, while outside a temperature of 48½ degrees minus, Centigrade, was registered.

Soon after they landed the scientists ate the luncheon they had carried with them. It consisted mainly of milk and sandwiches.

Eyewitnesses asserted the gondola continued for twenty to thirty feet after the bag itself was stopped in the tree top. The gondola finally came to rest on the logging road. Hundreds of persons rushed to the scene soon after the balloon landed.

The unceremonious landing came just before 3 P. M., Eastern standard time, and about eight hours after the Piccards soared, just over the treetops, at Detroit at 6:58 a.m. Glen Cope, a farmer, made a valiant attempt to halt the balloon as it drifted slowly a short distance above the ground, its ropes dragging.

He seized one of these ropes and attempted to tie it to a tractor. The balloon pulled the rope from his hands and scraped the top of a seventy-five-foot elm, the branches tearing the bag badly. The landing, while rough, merely shook up the aeronauts.

The American flag the Piccards caried was left flying at the top of the elm tree. The tree is more than at third of a mile from the highway and it is impossible to reach the spot except by the logging road.

The barograph was turned over to Deputy Sheriff Oscar Weinberg, who was instructed to guard it closely until it could be shipped to Washington to ascertain the exact height the Picards reached.

Take-Off Is Thrilling

Disaster was barely averted when the balloon took off at Detroit at 6:58 A. M. For a moment it seemed as if the airship would fail to clear the trees fringing Ford Airport. The balloon started sluggishly upward in the still air as Dr. Piccard threw a switch blasting loose the four last guy ropes with small charges of explosive.

The dangling gondola was swept along, only a few feet above the ground, toward a line of automobiles and another line of trees while cheers of the 45,000 spectators suddenly were stilled.

Mrs. Piccard, stationed in the rigging of the bag, proved her quick wit and her skill as a baloonist by hurling out ballast sufficient to clear both obstacles by the narrowest of margins. To some observers it semed that the gondola actually scraped the tops of the automobiles. Once the balloon was in the clear, Mrs. Piccard slid down into the gondola with her husband.

One of the most interested spectators of the take-off was Henry Ford. His automobile convoyed six buses filled with 150 pupils of his Greenfield Village school. He walked with the children to the edge of the roped-off enclosure surrounding the balloon and explained to them the apparatus and the purpose of the flight. Then he walked to the gondola, examined it and chatted with Dr. Piccard.

He said he had been so anxious to see the actual take-off that he stayed up all night for the first time in many years.

The balloon gained altitude slowly. Forty minutes after the take-off Mrs. Piccard communicated by radio with William Duckwitz, who had set up a radio station near the airport. Duckwitz said Mrs. Piccard told him they were a mile and a half in the air and that everything was going well.

The balloon made the perilous trip across Lake Erie without incident. It was first sighted in Ohio near Sandusky and before noon was high above Cleveland and Akron.

Professor Piccard showed the greatest effects of fatigue. He curled up in a blanket and lay on the folded envelope while he waited for E. M. Long, a Cadiz trucker. Profesor Piccard refused to depart until his craft was loaded aboard the truck and started back to Cadiz. From there it will be shipped to Detroit.

Radio's Profit Motive Faces Denunciations

First American Survey Brings Vigorous Appeal From Educators

Round denunciation of the profit motive as the mainspring of American radio programs is contained in testimony given to the broadcast division of the Federal Radio Communications Commission in the first great official study of the cultural effect of radio ever made in the United States, says an article in the Christian Science Monitor which follows.

While Canada has made two of these independent surveys, and England has decided that the cultural effect of radio for good or ill is so vital to the English that the whole system of broadcasting must be retained in the Government, the American Government is only now in the midst of its first great survey.

Following the extraordinary vote in the last Senate session by which the drastic Wagner-Hatfield amendment to allocate one-quarter of all broadcasting facilities at one stroke to educational and cultural interests got more than one-third of the total votes cast, and with the expectation of growing Congressional unrest in the forthcoming session, educators have been giving testimony in Washington demanding fundamental changes in the radio setup.

Defects Amid Quality

Alone of the great countries of the world, they charge, the ether has been handed over in America to commercial advertisers seeking private gain. Though admitting that some of the current broadcasts are superb in their excellence they stress nevertheless the defects of a system in which greed for profits is frequently dominant.

Dr. Joy Elmer Morgan, chairman of the National Committee in Education by Radio, with direct annual membership of 200,000, and editor of the National Education Association, has quoted the experience of Canada in meeting the same problems confronting the United States. The latest Canadian commission, under of chairmanship of Sir John Aird, concluded that "the very destiny of our cultural life" depends on adequate broadcasts.

One proposal before the American commission is that all direct sales talk should be forever prohibited on the radio. The very finest programs, it is pointed out, have been given with only the name of the sponsoring organization mentioned at the beginning and conclusion.

Parents in Helpless Situation

In particular the direct appeal being made to the children of the household over the heads of their helpless parents is stressed as a major situation needing reform.

Quoting the Canadian recommendations on this point, Dr. Morgan attacked this "effort to form the habits of children."

"Civilization cannot progress by abusing the children," he declared.

Other recommendations in Canada were that channels should be so allocated between different kinds of service that the listener would always have a choice between different types; that educational interests should have fixed channels, and that "it should not be possible for one monopoly to control both newspaper and radio in a given territory."

Regarding claims of the big chains of giving a majority share of their time to "non-commercial educational" programs, Dr. Morgan quoted an elaborately prepared brochure of the Columbia Broadcasting Company declaring that it was on the air 16 hours a day, "and that 70 per cent of its broadcasting is non-commercial."

To refute this, Dr. Morgan quoted comment from the theatrical magazine, Variety, of July 17, telling what time for the coming autumn and winter Columbia had sold up to that date. It stated that for the all-important hours of 8 to 10:30 every moment had been sold for six evenings a week, and that Columbia's listeners were to hear programs sponsored by concerns selling laxatives, shaving creams, cigarettes, soap, automobiles, radio sets, cigars, milk, magazines, soup and the like.

"It looks like a busy, educational winter," was the comment that Dr. Morgan quoted, as to this typical program.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Most Honored Poet Of All Time

The Scotch devotion to the genius and person of "Bobby" (or "Rabbie") Burns has no parallel in the history of literature. Not only is there a record number of Burns' clubs in every hamlet, village, town, and city wherever Scotsmen live, but the birthday of no man with the single exception of the Saviour, is celebrated so far and so wide. And no man of any nationality or time is so widely honored by public statues and memorials.

The Kilt And The Bagpipe

The kilt is not of Scotch origin, neither is the bagpipe. Both apparently originated in ancient Egypt. The bagpipe was introduced from Egypt into Persia, and later became the favorite instrument of Greece and Rome, being featured on ancient Roman coins and medals. When Lord Carnarvon unearthed the tomb of King Tutankhamon of Egypt, about 10 years ago, the guardian statute of the King's soul, known as the Kings "ka" was found in the tomb dressed in a "kilt" which had an unmistakable "Scotch" appearance. King Tut died in 1350 B. C.

South Produces Good Newsprint

Product From Georgia Pines Said To Exceed Strength Needed For Paper

Dr. Charles H. Herty, who has made newsprint out of Georgia pine trees, recently served notice on newsprint manufacturers that the United States has available every year in the southern states five and a half times as much high grade raw material for paper making in all its forms as the whole world annually consumes, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

The chemist, who has been experimenting with Georgia pine trees for several years, made his statement in connection with the action of Canadian premiers Taschereau of Quebec and Mitchell Hepburn of Ontario, in declaring that as an economic necessity Canadian newsprint mills must no longer sell at the 1934 price of $40 and $41 a ton.

Much of the American supply comes from the Canadian mills. Dr. Herty said his research work was complete now and "simple economics is going to settle this matter eventually."

He said his paper made from pine trees has a tensile strength many times greater than that now required by the most modern newspaper press. Several daily papers in the South and numerous weeklies have printed special editions on newsprint from southern pine and reported it satisfactory.

Saying he had been informed an Act of Parliament could be arranged under which authorities could prohibit export of certain produce unless it was sold at certain prices, Dr. Herty said:

"What more striking need of economic independence in so vital a matter as newsprint than is this newsprint to be sold by the newspapers of the United States.

YOUTH TO THE FRONT

"This is a young man's day," Herbert C. Wilson, American student, declared in addressing the first meeting of the Tokyo leaders of the youth movement in the Y. M. C. A. Wednesday evening. He is a representative of the World Council of Youth executive committee.

Present were 26 chairmen of English Speaking Societies, International Relations Clubs, and Student conferences.

Mr. Wilson pointed out that though young people have golden opportunities in this age, they lack the art of working together. They do not know how to co-operate with one another. He said that there are many student and young peoples groups, all of which should be brought together in one big, powerful organization.

He went on to point out that in Southern California many separate youth movements were competing in putting on programs of international and interracial education. With the Olympic Games of 1932 in Los Angeles, however, many of these groups associated themselves in preparing for a great world meeting of youth to accompany the Olympiad with an intellectual gathering—seriously looking at the future. 251 delegates from 23 countries and races attended this ten day conference, 22 of them from Japan. Stimulated by their success, a continuance committee was appointed to carry of the program of student conferencing, exchange and travel. Working organizations have been built up in America and Hawaii, and contacts made with Australia, New Zealand, and the Philippine Islands. The movement is now spreading to the Orient.

The committee moved to meet again in two weeks to officially set up the Japan Council of Youth. Sub-committees on conferencing, student exchange and travel, and permanent organization are outlining plans. Cooperation of all groups will be sought.

Mr. Wilson has been in Tokyo since August and intends to remain for a year or more. He is a student in the School of Japanese Language and Culture.

Chiropractic Is Not Yet Popular With Japanese

chiropractor can easily find the trouble by merely working on the backbone of the patient. The chiropractor does not apply even a dose of medicine, hence he is considered a conspirator, going against modern medical science. He uses dietetic treatment in addition to his own method, "because he knows that foodstuffs contains the elements necessary for the human body to retain life and to heal the disordered part," claimed the doctor.

Necessary Elements

"In fact, medical literature gives ample examples of diseases that come from the lack of some necessary elements and that may be cured by supplying foods which contain the element lacking," he said.

"There are still many Japanese who do not know even the technical name of the treatment, and chiropractic was introduced to Japan for the first time only a few years ago by Saburo Kawaguchi, who is now practicing in Shanghai. "In Japan, only a few chiropractors are engaging in the tretament," Dr. Hataya concluded.

Dr. Hataya, a pioneer of this system in Japan is a son of Mr. Wataru Hataya who studied at "Daigaku Nanko" and former Tokyo Imperial University, and opened the Hataya Hospital in Yokohama.

Born in Yokohama in 1883 and graduating from the Yokohama Commercial School in 1902, and the Philadelphia Medical College he joined the staff of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha in Yokohama, where he served for about ten years.

During this time, Mr. Hataya injured his leg, which retarded the growth of his whole body, and he was treated by Chiropractor Kawaguchi, who made the injured limb as good as before.

Moved by the experiment, he made up his mind to devote himself to the study of the chiropratic science, and he went to the United States and entered the Palmer School.

Immediately upon his return to Japan, Dr. Hataya opened offices in Tokyo and Yokohama to apply modern medical treatment to treat the many patients.

He has an office on the fifth floor of the Yuraku Building, Marunouchi, Tokyo, and a branch office at 2,500, Honmoku-machi, Yokohama.

Terms For New Anglo-German Pact Explained

Runciman Gives Talk In House Of Commons; Warns Exporters To Be Careful

After questions in the House of Commons recently Mr. Runciman told an audience, swollen in anticipation of the first breeze on Indian policy, the terms for a new Anglo-German trade agreement which the British delegation had been able to bring back from Berlin.

Mr. Runciman was not over-enthusiastic, and warned British exporters to continue to be careful, but he claimed that the terms obtained were much better than anything which seemed likely up to the eleventh hour. He disclosed, indeed, that nothing more than an agreement for a clearing house had seemed possible for a long time, and that an up-to-date model of such a scheme had actually been initialled by the British and German representatives. That scheme remained in reserve, and would be applied if the scheme actually adopted broke down. Meanwhile the following arrangements, suggested by the German Government, had been adopted to safeguard German payment for British exports and to liquidate outstanding debts.

The German Government agreed to earmark for payment for British exports to Germany 55 per cent of the sterling obtained by the sale of German exports to the United Kingdom. Upon the past figures of the balance of trade this sum ought to be enough for payment in full.

Existing Debts

The Richsbank would provide at once at least £400,000 to discharge existing commercial debts, and would do their best to mobilize existing sterling credits, probably by a new credit operation, to be used for the same purpose.

Any balance of indebtedness would be met within 12 months by earmarking a further 10 per cent of the value of German exports to this country.

The sondermarks now paid or being paid into a special account would all be liquidated by special arrangements within three months.

Exchange Certificates

The German Government retained the right, after consulting the British Government, to control the issue of foreign exchange certificates necessary to obtain payment for British exports to Germany. But the issue would be unrestricted to begin with, and later restriction, if and when imposed, would show special consideration for exports of coal and coke, herrings, yarns, tissues, and textile manufactures.

Dawes and Young Loans

As regards the loans to Germany, the German Government agreed to pay full interest as from January 1, 1935, upon Dawes and Young bonds which were held by British citizens on June 15, 1934.

They would also offer to British holders of other than Reich loans guaranteed Four per Cent. Funding Bonds, provided that such bonds were accepted in full settlement of any coupons funded.

Mr. Runciman ended his statement with the claim and the warning already noted. Members clearly wanted him to decide how far both were justified. Meanwhile Mr. Lansbury courteously complained that the Opposition had not been given the usual notice and sight of an important and impending statement. Mr. Runciman explained that it had been prepared in answer to an ordinary question not reached, so that there was neither slighting intention nor bad blood in the matter.

Cost Of War To U.S.

It has cost the United States U.S.$40,583,000,000 to win the World War not including nearly U.S.$12,000,000,000 advanced in war loans according to figures compiled by the United States treasury, recently. The cost is believed to be increasing at least a billion dollars additional yearly with veterans' benefits, non-payment of interest by war debtors and the heavy interest load on the United States government on money borrowed in waging the war.

Another Boom Predicted For Florida Realty

Since January Conditions Have Improved Steadily In Every Section Of State

Developments during recent weeks indicate that Florida is on the verge of a great revival of real estate activity, according to a New York Herald Tribune's special story written recently by Mr. Charles H. Leichliter, whose article follows.

Many observers are even predicting the imminence of another boom. These optimists base their prophecy on the fact that real estate, so far as popularity in the investment field is concerned, has for several years been in the sub-sub-cellar, if not buried out of sight. They declare that the fundamenental value of Florida real estate has not been impaired; that its earning capacity is as great, or greater, than it ever was and to this basic value has been added, as the direct result of the boom of a decade ago and the succeeding steady development, vast intrinsic values in roads, telephone and electric expansion of all sorts and vast stretches of sewers, water mains, sidewalks, white ways and oher improvements.

Figuring on this basis they claim that, while present day prices are on the average no greater, if as great, as the 1916 level, when there were no good roads and other improvements of daily necessity to all civilized communities, the investor of today is getting his real estate at fundamental prices with all these costly necessities of modern life thrown in. This fact, they argue, makes real estate in the "Empire of the Sun" such a super bargain that it cannot fail to attract the serious attention of thousands of investors who already are, again, strongly real estate minded.

Florida Out of Depression

It seems to be true, on the evidence of activity during the last eight to ten months, that Florida, first of the sections of the country to feel the depression, is in the van of recovery. There has been a steady buying market since January that has, on the records, shown almost daily rise in volume. This increase became a phenomenon when it continued, against all expectations, throughout the summer months periods hitherto, with the exception of the summers of 1924 and 1925, almost totally dormant so far as real estate transactions were concerned.

This situation is due in great part to the fact that for seven or eight years past there has been a marked annual increase in the amount of summer travel from the North into the land of flowers.

Not so long ago Florida summers were generally supposed to be as correspondingly hot as its winters were mild in temperature. As this notion was dispelled by actual contact and it was realized that no other section of the country affords such a uniformity of temperature well under the 100 degree mark and no other latitude is so free from humidity nor blessed at all times of day and might with cooling breezes from ocean or gulf, there has come a steady inflex of summer visitors, a good proportion of whom have become permanent residents.

It has been found that the land of flowers is at its prettiest in the months after the "snow birds" habitually flit to their Northern homes. It has been found by sportsmen that Florida summer is the ideal time for camping and fishing. It has been realized by the more serious minded that some of the best growing months for agriculture are in what in the North are spring and early summer. This, with the dispelling, through actual investigation, of the fallacy that Florida in summer is no place for a white man" has come the growing determination of a great mass of homeseekers to locate permanently, in a land where human beings do not shiver in extreme cold nor swelter in excessive heat.

These and many oher reasons are advanced to account for the fact that there is perhaps no community of any consequence throughout the state that does not show a substantial increase in population over the past seven years. This is shown by school enrollment, increase in telephone, elecric light, water and gas meter service and by recent Federal census figures. There have been few instances of recession of population, but, on the other hand, a slow, steady and substantial growth.

There is an old saying in Florida that once one gets "sand in his shoes" it is impossible to keep wanderers from returning. Evidence of this is apparent in every Florida community today in the reappearance of persons once well known in the state. This is particularly true of those once prominent in real estate brokerage, investment, promotion and development. Many of the old timers are back again, harbingers of another springtime in real estate activity. And just as the coming of the robins herald the event of spring does the foregathering of real estate experts in any section betoken the advent of great real estate activities. All prophetic elements are here to back up the prediction that the coming winter months will see a startling wave of buying and selling of real property, improved and unimproved.

Florida, with her vast stretches of fertile soil, cooled by breezes from ocean and gulf and its many interior lakes and network of rivers, which serve, too, to keep it well irrigated, presents opportunities for vast development.

On Routes to New York

At the threshold of our greatest centers of population, it is now possible for people in New York or Chicago to commute, by air, almost as easily between Florida and their places of business as it is by rail from New York to Connecticut, or Chicago to Wisconsin or Michigan. Thus many men of means are attending to business in great financial or manufacturing and industrial centers while their families live in comfort and in health in Florida, and find it possible themselves to spend week ends and other periods with scant loss of either time or comfort.

Such a situation has made possible the growth of Palm Beach, Miami Beach, Daytona Beach and others on the East Coast; of Clearwater and Bon Air; St. Petersburg, Sarasota and Bradeton, the Gulf of Mexico; of Orlando, Ocala, Lakeland, Sebring, Fort Myers and other well known and popular communities of the interior.

Nor is the northern part of the state suffering from lack of popularity and growth. Never in winter quite so warm as the southern section lying below the semi-tropical line, which stretches approximately from Tampa, on the west coast, to Vero Beach, on the Atlantic, there are thousands who prefer the slightly cooler winters of the northern part of Florida to the southern. The same proclivities exist as regards summer habitation. Thus it is true that the favor with which the growing mass of immigrants regard Florida is shared without jealousy or discrimination by the considerably divergent climatic divisions of north and south Florida.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Contraband City

Lerwick, capital of the Shetland Islands, Scotland, was originally built as a trading post for Dutch fishing vessels. The houses were built either on seashore or actually in the sea, with the backdoor opening towards the harbor. This arrangement was made for the convenience of Dutch smugglers in landing the contraband portion of their cargoes without much fear of interference from revenue officers. Most of the old houses are still provided with ingenious places of concealment for smuggled goods and some have subterranean passages for the same purpose.

Faster Wireless Methods Forecast

Speedy Transmission To Replace Dashes, Dots, RCA Officials Say

Radio telegraphy is on the verge of replacing dots and dashes with new high speed facsimile transmission methods making it possible to send pictures or words over micro waves in about the time required for one dot and dash on the present system, the Radio Corporation of America has just announced, says a United Press despatch dated Nov. 12.

Perfection of the system would make it possible for anyone to transmit a picture from New York to Chicago, for instance, in a fraction of a second, instead of the longer time required under the present system of transmitting pictures, according to Mr. David Sarnoff, president of the Company.

Present System Slow

Officials of RCA said the present system requires 30 to 40 minutes to transmit a picture. Rapid transmission would lead the way to practical television since moving picture projection requires only 20 images per second.

In addition to being available for pictures, the new service will transmit fascimiles of letters, the announcement said. Thus a business man will be able to dictate an important letter, read the typed copy and have it transmitted just as he now sends a telegram. The fascimile letter which could contain many times the number of words in an ordinary telegram would be transmitted almost instantly.

Efficient Channel

The micro waves to be used for transmission, measuring only a few inches in length, provide a more efficient channel of communication than the wave length in use, the announcement said. They are free from static and apparently are not absorbed by the steel in tall city buildings, thus making possible transmission centers in the heart of large cities, it was said.

The waves, unlike the longer commercial waves, do not pass beyond the curvature of the earth's surface, so that they are limited to the distance from the transmitting apparatus to the horizon. This difficulty is combatted by the use of "booster" or relay stations, each of which receives the micro-waves and retransmits them to another station within its own horizon.

Gain In U.S. Trade Attributed To New Deal

discussion in Congress for many years. We now have a highly subsidized merchant marine. Subsidies are simply relative. When we subsidize, other countries subsidize, and the race is on. I think it would be quite possible to enter into some sort of international agreement on the question of ship subsidies.

"I have always felt that the subsidy should be broader than it is; rather than giving the subsidy direct to the ship operators, I have always advocated a subsidy from the point of manufacture on freight rates for all exports. That would compel and would, of course, attract most of our export trade to American ships and would give the exporter an advantage in competing in foreign markets. I believe that our whole policy of the merchant marine ought to be carefully studied and revised. I think it is absolutely unsound to carry on the mail subsidy when no mail is carried."

He explained that the city's shipping facilities, including piers, were operated not from the standpoint of revenue but to stimulate commerce. He also told what the city had contributed towards commerce by building airports.

Threat From Brazil Seen

Joseph W. Evans, chairman of the Navigation and Canal Commissioners, Houston, Texas, discussing the future of American cotton, mentioned the threat from Brazil's growing production and pointed out that whereas the AAA curtailment program limited the crop to a little more than 10,000,000 bales, nature had cut the crop to approximately 9,500,000 bales, giving North Carolina a surplus and leaving Texas with a shortage.

Addressing the European Luncheon Session, William S. Culbertson, former Ambassador to Chile and former vice chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, declared that the United States could not regain prosperity until it put aside ideas of living within its political frontiers. Asserting that the bilateral treaties were in the wrong direction, he advocated going back to the favored-nations clause, asserting: "The world must prosper if we are to have prosperity in this country."

Joseph C. Rovensky, vice president of the Chase National Bank, asserted that Germany was still a debtor in a critical situation, that "we were over-enthusiastic and dreadfully wrong in advancing such large sums in the aggregate and the Germans were equally wrong in taking them"; but that Germany had been criticized to some extent unfairly as having acted in bad faith on the loans she placed abroad.

Dr. Henry Chalmers, chief of the Division of Foreign Tariffs of the Department of Commerce, disclosed that a study of the 120 European trade agreements in the last year had shown that they had resulted in no appreciable trade increase, probably because the agreements were not intended to accomplish that purpose.

Richard Washburn Child, former Ambassador to Italy, presided at the European luncheon session.

Emphasis on imports was made by most of the speakers at the merchandizing section.

C. W. Linscheid, manager of the foreign division, Fairbanks, Morse & Co., said: "'Reciprocity' is the hub of the situation. International trade must be a two-way commerce."

Dr. Thomas H. Healy of the School of Foreign Service, Georgetown University; Curt G. Pfeiffer, president of the National Council of American Importers and Traders, Inc.; C. E. Bingham, vice president of Bingham & Co., director of the American Exporters and Importers Association and chairman the the General Importers Code Authority, also discussed the problem.

Gertrude Stein Makes Debut As Speaker In U.S.

First Address, On "Pictures," Brings Unanimous Applause

Gertrude Stein made her American debut as a speaker recently before an audience that packed the ballroom of the Colony Club, at New York City listened intently for nearly an hour to the frequently puzzling involutions and reptitions of her diction and went away afterward to argue, according to the New York Times.

The 60-year-old writer who recently returned to her native country after an absence in Europe of thirty-one years talked about "Pictures." Her audience was made up of members of the Museum of Modern Art, under whose auspices the lecture was given. Only members of the museum were admitted.

Because of the limited capacity of the Colony Club ballroom and Miss Stein's refusal to address an audience of more than 500, each member of the museum wast limited to one ticket. Requests for tickets came to the museum from States as distant at Kentucky and Vermont

No Formal Introduction

Promptly at 9 o'clock Miss Stein, in a simple brown dress, plain and voluminous, walked to the platform of the ballroom from a side entrance and began reading her lecture without the formality of an introduction.

The simplicity of her garb, the only adornment of which was a brooch at her throat, was in marked contrast to the gowns of most of her hearers and to the crimson damask hangings of the while walled ballroom. A number of the museum's socially prominent directors and members were present in the audience.

At the end of the address there was obviously no unanimity of opinion among the audience as to its meaning or significance. It was obvious, however, that most of those present had been entertained, for the applause at Miss Stein's closing remarks as she removed her horn rimmed glasses was prolonged.

Remarks were overheard that she had held her audience as much by her personality as by her address. Other persons ventured the opinions that the interest of the audience had not been unmixed with curiosity.

Talks of Early Studies

Miss Stelin's entire lecture dealt with her development of her study of the nature of pictures. She told of her early reactions to paintings as a girl in her native America and of her subsequent intellectual experiences in the museums of Europe

If there were persons in the audience who had hoped that she would narrate some of her experiences with Picasso, Matisse and other members of the modern school of painting whose friendship she has enjoyed during her long residence in Paris, they were disappointed. Miss Stein devoted herself only to revealing her own intellectual reactions and opinions.

Her conclusions are summed un, at least partly, in one of the final, slightly unpunctuated paragraphs of her manuscripts, in which she said:

"I have thought a great deal about all this and I am still thinking about it. I have passionately hoped that some picture would remain out of its frame. I think it can even while it does not, even while it remains there. And this is the problem of all modern painting just as it has been the problem of all old painting. That is to say the first hope of a painter who really feels hopeful about painting is the hope that the painting will move, that it will live outside its frame."

Members of the audience who read some of Miss Stein's writings and had been puzzled by their economical punctuation were interested last night in listening to her inflections as she read briefly from her writings at the end of the lecture. She read them as if they had been punctuated precisely by a teacher of grammar.

"When I look at landscapes or people or flowers they do not look to me like pictures, no not at all," she said. "On the other hand pictures for me do not have to look like flowers or people or landscapes or houses or anything else. They can, they often do, but they do not have to.

"Once an oil painting is painted, painted on a flat surface, painted by anybody who likes or is hired or is interested to paint it, or who has or has not been taught to paint it, I can always look at it and it always holds my attention. The painting may be good, it may be bad, medium or very bad or very good but always but anyway I like to look at it."

At times there were ripples of laughter as she remarked that at first the Louvre had looked to her "like only gold frames," that she enjoyed "looking out of the windows of museums," and that she had enjoyed sleeping on the "long red benches" in Italian museums, also how she had spent long hours on hot days in Italy feeling marble to see whether it was genuine or painted.

According to some members of the audience, Miss Stein's straightforwardness and amiability largely disarmed those who had come to find fault. At the outset of her lecture she laughingly tested the carrying power of her voice, asking if she could be heard in the rear of the room

Miss Stein had notified the Museum of Modern Art earlier that she did not wish to go to the lecture by motor but preferred to walk from her hotel in West Forty-third Street to the Colony Club, at Park Avenue and Sixtq-second Street.

J.S. Bryan Sees U.S. In Throes of 3rd Revolution

New President Of College Of William And Mary Likens Day's Problem To Slavery's

John Stewart Bryan, president and publisher of "The News-Leader," of Richmond, in his inaugural address recently as nineteenth president of the College of William and Mary said that America was now in the throes of its "third revolution and must deal with problems that are as menacing economically as slavery was to our grandfathers.

"These considerations, which make the future of the world dark, he said, were the complex forces of narrow nationalism, crushing debt, vast unemployment and, above all, the universal uncertitude that flows from the submergence of old landmarks says the New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Bryan paid tribute to President Roosevelt, comparing his administration with that of another Democrat, President Cleveland, during whose time were felt "the first angry gusts of the whirlwind of economic change which broke in its fury on President Roosevelt in 1933." President Roosevelt, he continued, had summoned to his aid faith, courage, purpose and imagination, the same spiritual forces used by Cleveland in fighting the social enemies of doubt, despair, fear and blindness.

Succeeds Dr. Chandler

Mr. Bryan, in officially assuming office, succeeds the late Dr. Julian A. C. Chandler, who died on May 31 of this year. The college which he heads is the second oldest in the United States, having been founded in 1693, following Harvard, which was chartered in 1636. It was largely through the efforts of Francis Nicholson, the then Governor of the Virginia Colony, who wished "to foster the infant college" that Williamsburg became the capital of Virginia in 1699.

Mr. Bryan is a native Virginian, the son of Joseph and Elizabeth Stewart Bryan, of Brook Hill Henrico County. On Tuesday, October 23, he observed his sixty-third birthday anniversary. He attended the Norwood School, Richmond, and Episcopal High School, Alexandria, and received both a bachelor's and a master's degree from the University of Virginia and a law degree from Harvard.

In opening his address Mr. Bryan pointed out the significance of the numerals 93 in connection with the college, including the fact that it was founded in 1693, and then discussed 1893, during which year President Cleveland was in office, to introduce the political phase of his speech.

Links Cleveland and Roosevelt

"Coming to matters within our own memory," he said, "let us look back four decades to 1893. Then, as now, a Democrat and a great leader was in the White House. Then, as now, there was unemployment hunger, misery, the threat of revolution and the frequency of riots, men's hearts failing them because of fear. At that time Cleveland felt the first angry gusts of the whirlwind of economic change which broke in its fury on President Roosevelt in 1933.

"Then as now this nation was fortunate in having a Democratic leader who knew that we are not mere helpless pebbles, tossed hither and thither at random by the purposeless waves of a sea without beginning, without meaning and without end. Both Presidents knew that we can control those destinies that are alone of supreme significance—the destinies of faith, of courage, of purpose, of imagination, precisely those spiritual forces that President Roosevelt has summoned to his aid in dealing with the social enemies of doubt, despair, fear and blindness that marked our economic tragedy. The President himself has shown how revivifying the spirit can be when informed imagination grapples courageously with the problems of life, whether those problems be desportism in 1776 or depression in 1933".

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Eleven 7th Sons

One of the most widely prevalent superstitions refers to the mystic power of the figure "7". A seventh son is believed to have the faculty of curing diseases by mere touch, which miraculous power is believed to increase with each succession of seven sons. In the family of the Joneses of Muddfi, Wales, there is a record of eleven successive generations of seven sons each. Each 7th son of his generation always became a doctor, apparently from an inherited conviction that he had an innate qualification for that profession.

The Forever Moor

In exchange for some assistance given him by Dutch fishermen, King Charles I, of England granted them the right to sell eels off Billingsgate Fish Market, London, in perpetuity. The only condition was that the mooring should never be vacant and for nearly 300 years now, a Dutch eel-boat has been permanently moored there in order to maintain the ancient Royal Franchise.

Rivers Diverted At Mexico City

Beds Of Torrents Converted Into Boulevards—Lake Bottom Reclaimed

One of Mexico City's problems of long standing—danger of flood in large sections of the city—is being attacked with modern engineering under the direction of the Federal District Government and the Federal Ministry of Communications and Public Works, according to an article in the Christian Science Monitor.

On Oct. 11 the first two units of the flood prevention program, which on completion will transform two ancient rivers within the city into boulevards, were formally inaugurated by Federal District Governor Aaron Saenz and Subsecretary of Communications Mariano Moctezuma. The units are the San Joaquin Dam and the Barranca del Tornillo Dam. The first is located in the adjoining State of Mexico, carrying, through a tunnel and canal five kilometers long, the waters which previously descended toward Mexico City. These waters are now conducted to the Remedios River; great flood danger being eliminated through this means and through communication with the Tecamachalco Dam.

The Consulado River, which formerly brought torrential rain waters into the low zones of the capital, will vanish and will become part of one of the longest throughfares in Mexico. Sanitary benefits will also result from the abolition of the Consulado, which during the dry seasons has been hardly more than a cesspool winding through a large part of the city.

Three kilometers from the San Joaquin diversion dam is Barranca del Tornillo dam, which is a combined diversion and storage dam conducting surplus waters out of the Valley of Mexico.

Approximately 200,000 pesos have already been spent on the flood control plans of which these two dams are a part. Work is being started on the Tacubaya Dam, the waters of which will be conducted through a subterranean tunnel along with those of the other two dams and all will then empty into the diversion canal and be carried to the Remedios River. This work will cost about 300,000 pesos.

Another feature of the canal system is the special pumping plant and aqueducts which are to carry the drainage waters from the main sewage canal to the old Texcoco Lake bed, to refertilize that large City bringing it into agricultural area adjoining Mexico City, bringing it into agricultural production, and at the same time eliminating the annual dust storms which for several months preceding the rainy season sweep into Mexico City.

GIVE AWAY TOYS

More than 200 Japanese children crowded wide-eyed and grinning, around a long table stacked high with pretty Japanese toys Sunday.

All the bright colored toys were given away—and yet not one child's tiny arm was outstretched to receive a single battledore or other gift.

Strange as it may seem, there was no sound of whispering but only the sight of broader grins as the children saw all the pretty things given to some-one else, a full grown man at that.

The receiver was Mr. Russell Durgin, Y.M.C.A. The reason not a child cried when he received all the toys is simply this:

Last summer, the Tokyo Playground Association received a large shipment of American toys which the leaders distributed among the children who use the playgrounds. Sunday, they gathered the return gift of battledores and other Japanese toys, to send to American children. The toys were presented to Mr. Durgin for shipment to American playground centers while the children who had received the American toys looked on. Mr. Durgin didn't know exactly why he was selected to receive the toys but thought it might be because he was one of five to represent Japan at the first international recreation conference ever held, in 1932.

Indian Congress Party Against White Paper

tions of the Princes, would strangle self-government.

As for the reality of the transferred powers, he maintained that the Governor-General and the Governors were given powers so strong that what was conceded with one hand was withdrawn by the other. This applied quite apart from defence and foreign affairs. Law and order, though held to be transferred to the Provinces, were kept "quite safe within the double lock of the special responsibility of the Governor-General and Governor." The White Paper showed nothing in the way of popular control of finances. It was calculated that 80 per cent. of the central finances were being retained for the Army, debt service, pay pensions, and other things. The Minister's control over the central public purse would consequently be practically nil.

In effect, the While Paper did not bring India anywhere near Dominion status, quite apart from independence, nor did the scheme provide for automatic growth towards such status. There was no pretence of self-determination in the scheme, and the Federation which was coming was coming at the will of the British Parliament.

Dealing with the internal affairs of the Congress, Mr. Prasad made the frank admission that the Government had been victorious in their campaign against subversive political agitation.

He said that civil disobedience had been suspended in the interests of the country, the principal reason being the Congress Party's own weakness. The party was now engaged in a campaign to contest the Legislatures, and was formulating a policy regarding the White Paper, the "ruthless repression" of the Government of India, and the Communal Award. The party neither accepted nor rejected the Communal Award, and the Working Committee had no alternative but to point out that the Award would be unsatisfactory and anti-national.

Regarding the decision to contest the elections, Mr. Prasad said that they should not be deceived by the idea that Swaraj could be achieved by anything they could do in the Legislatures. He was convinced that there was a determination on the part of the rulers not to part with power, but he made it clear that nothing short of independence would satisfy the Congres.

The general tone of this speech was in keeping with the temper of the delegates as a whole. Other speakers also declared independence to be the ultimate goal.

Russia Is Being Seen Through Colored Glasses

"diseases attributable to malnutrition", "the work of prisoners".

Although the officials of the Soviet Commissariat for Foreign Affairs who administer the censorship are above the Soviet bureaucratic average in tact and intelligence, they are themselves closely limited in their decisions, and must often refer border-line and debatable messages to mysterious individuals and organizations "higher up". Their task is far from an enviable one; their career may be ruined if they pass a message which subsequently impresses a high Soviet or Communist official as unduly outspoken.

The Soviet brand of censorship, like all others, not infrequently makes itself ridiculous, as when it lays an interdict on the mention of an incident of diplomatic negotiations which is already well-known abroad, or forbids a correspondent to send the startling news that a Soviet express train was stalled in the desert for a few hours, or refuses to permit the foreign correspondents to report the departure of Foreign Commissar Litvinov to America (Litvinov's going was attended by the most ludicruous atmosphere of schoolboy mystery). More serious, from the standpoint of conveying to the outside world a genuine view of Russian conditions, are the well-nigh complete suppression of the news of the famine, the concealment of many secret executions and of almost all cases of administrative banishment, and the inevitable emasculation of style of the correspondent who is always obliged to take the probably reaction of the censor into consideration when he is writing his telegrams.

The scope of Soviet control over the information about Russia which is permitted to reach the outside world was considerably extended in the spring of 1933 when a new rule came into effect, under which no correspondent could leave Moscow without submitting a precise itinerary of his route and obtaining the permission of the authorities. The obvious intenion of this drastic restriction (which has no precedent in any other European country) was to prevent any first-hand description of the famine. The prohibition came into effect in early spring; the first permits to travel in the country districts were issued in September, when the new harvest was gathered in and the raw visible traces of the famine had been removed.

Travel Restricted

An official explanation of the prohibition of travel was that the presence of foreign correspondents would obstruct the reaping of the harvest. What was even more amusing than this suggestion that a few itinerant correspondents might seriously affect the fate of harvesting operations over almost one-sixth of the surface of the globe was that some foreigners were naive enough to take it seriously.

I found conclusive evidence of the real reason for the stoppage of free travel by foreign correspondents when I received an individual permission to travel in Ukraina and the North Caucasus in September 1933. I visited three regions which were separated from each other by hundreds of miles: Kropotkin, in the North Caucasus, and Poltava and Byelaya Tserkov, in Ukraina. I also talked with peasants at railway stations from the south-east corner of Ukraina, in the Donetz Basin, to the north-Western part, in Chernigov Province. On the basis of figures which were supplied, not by peasants, who were often prone to exaggerate the numbers who had died, but of local Soviet officials and collective farm presidents, whose interest would rather have been to minimize the catastrophe which had taken place, I have no hesitation in saying that the southern and south-eastern provinces of European Russia during the first six months of 1933 experienced a major famine, with an average mortality rate of about 10 per cent.

Roosevelt Maps Administration's Trade Policies

Seeks Unified Action To Break Down 'Artificial Barriers' And Aid Recovery

President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull, in messages read at the Nnational Foreign Trade Convention dinner at the Hotel Commodore on the evening of November 1 declared that the Federal Government was trying to break down artificial trade barriers to promote American foreign commerce along with the trade of the whole world, says the New York Times.

F. D. Roosevelt

In a telegram addressed to James A. Farrell, chairman of the National Foreign Trade Council, President Roosevelt said the government was attacking the problem under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act and seeking to make arrangements with other nations to improve existing conditions.

Secretary Hull declared that the United States, while seeking to make no particular trade agreements, still stood for the most-favored-nation policy as best calculated to level artificial trade barriers.

The President's Message

President Roosevelt's message follows:

"It gives me pleasure to send cordial greetings to those assembled at the world trade dinner of the National Foreign Trade Council, which has done much valuable work in the promotion of our foreign commerce. It is an appropriate time to give thought to the subject of world trade since it has fallen in the last few years from a flourishing state to a very low level.

"The causes of the decline are various, but among the most serious of them are the unnecessary and artificial barriers which hamper the healthy interchange of commodities.

"As you are aware, this government has given zealous attention to the problem and under authority of the Trade Agreements Act is seeking to make arrangements with other countries designed to improve existing conditions. Our object is to secure concerted action to untangle the network of existing restrictions.

"Just as the sudden falling off in world trade reacted disastrously on the domestic economy of all countries, so revival of world trade should have a favorable influence on domestic recovery everywhere.

"We are seeking to rehabilitate international commerce in a way that will benefit not a single nation but all nations, not a group of nations but the whole world. Swift communications have made us all neighbors. They should also make us good neighbors."

Hull's Address Is Read

Secretary Hull, scheduled to have addressed the meeting, did not attend on advice of his doctor, and his address was read by Francis B. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State. In his address Secretary Hull asserted that world trade comrpising exports and imports valued at $68,000,000 in 1929 had shrunk in 1933 to $24,000,000,000 and that the share of the United States in it had fallen from around $10,000,000,000 in 1929 to about $2,500,000,000 in 1933.

He said that our domestic exports in 1932 were valued at $1,576,000,000 the lowest figure in thirty years, and that for 1933 they had increased about $100,000,000, adding:

"In the light of such an appalling loss, how can any thinking person desiring his own and his country's prosperity fail to search out the causes of the disaster and seek to remove them? It should be obvious, it seems to me, that if this could happen when the country was under the highest tariff in its history, then high tariffs could not be the infallible and inevitable producers of prosperity they had been represented to be.

"If the world as a whole is to progress, we must get away from the shabby heresy that acceptance of the products of other countries is inimical to our own interests. Every import pays for some export, and every export gives employment to labor and profit to industry.

"Extreme nationalism, if persisted in, is destined soon to wreck our entire structure of Western civilization.

"The current obstructions to international trade have taken on forms not wholly new but multiplied and developed with amazing ingenuity in numberless directions. We are now confronted with the close regimentation and intricate control of imports by means of quotas, import licenses, exchange control, government monopolies and control boards.

"Such regimentation of foreign trade inevitably forces the country that pursues these policiese into an extension of internal control over its domestic industries. The rapidity with which these controls are being introduced is a serious disturbing factor in the current industrial situation and a serious obstacle to recovery.

"It is of the utmost importance that the current artificial trends in foreign commercial policy be reversed. To achieve this end requires and advance on many fronts. An effort must be made simultaneously to achieve an improved price-and-cost relationship in the several domestic economies, to reestablish equilibrium in the international price structure, to secure currency and exchange stability and to remove step by step the current close regulations of foreign trade through quota restrictions, import licenses, exchange control and clearing and compensation agreements.

"Conditions are improving with sufficient rapidity in the Latin-American countries to make one optimistic that, if right policies are pursued, the achievement of free exchange markets is feasible in the not far distant future.

"The objective of the United States, which we are all vitally concerned to reach, is full stable and permanent business recovery, and experience teaches that this requires both a domestic and international program.

"Losses and dislocations resulting from shrunken foreign trade cannot possibly be compensated by mere increase of domestic trade, but we find some nations attempting the impossible by supporting movements for domestic production of inferior qualities or substitutes for imports at two to five times their cost elsewhere.

"While seeking to make particular trade agreements, the United States still stands for the most-favored-nation policy as calculated to bring down trade barriers generally. At the same time it rejects the practice sometimes employed of raising tariff rates solely for bargaining purposes as being repugnant to the spirit in which the negotiations should be undertaken.

"We wish to break down all the artificial and excessive impediments put in the way of world commerce, not only in our own interest but for the benefit of all others as well. Fierce and unregulated struggles among nations for trade produce both economic and political disturbances. They are the almost certain precursors of war. Friendly, orderly international trade, however, is not only indispensable to the domestic prosperity of most countries; it is also one of the greatest educators, civilizers, and peacemakers. A hermit nation means a hermit civilization."

Secretary Hull said that the Montevideo Conference of twenty-one American Republics, begun under the most discouraging circumstances last December, had adopted a program unanimously, in which the rest of the world was invited to join, calculated to restore international trade to a flourishing condition by lowering trade barriers to a moderate level. He declared it was the "only constructive plan for world economic rehabilitation that has yet been proposed."

Depression Over, Says Henry Ford Outlining Plans

Orders His 1935 Schedule Of Production Increased To 1,000,000 Cars

The Ford Motor Company is out of the depression, Henry Ford declared on November 1. At the same time he raised the production schedule of his plants to 1,000,000 cars next year, a mark which has not been touched in the last four years, says the New York Times.

"Make it 1,000,000 or better," said Mr. Ford. "Our experience during the last six months and what we see in the future tells us a year of improved business is ahead."

"Do you think 1935 will end the depression?" he was asked.

"Why, the depression would be over for the whole country very soon," was the reply, "if American industrialists would just forget these alphabet schemes and take hold of their industries and run them with good, sound American business sense. They should take hold of their country, too, in the same way and run it with good, sound American common sense."

Expanding Company's Steel Plant

Ford managers at Detroit from all parts of the country expressed the belief that business conditions generally had improved sufficiently to warrant preparations for a great sales year in 1935.

The production schedule for 1935 is the greatest since 1930, when 1,485,000 cars were produced.

On July 19, the 22,000,000th Ford ran off the assembly line. Of this number 15,000,000 were model T's and slightly more than a million were V-8s.

The announcement of next year's production plans came two months after Mr. Ford stated he was spending nearly $20,000,000 in construction of a steel plant at Dearborn.

Construction of new steel mills is expected to take eight months. When completed they will enable the company to produce 3,000 cars a day without buying a pound of steel in the open market.

Coincident with the announcement of the 1935 schedule, it was reported that the company plans to spend $2,000,000 to expand the capacity of its River Rouge plant by 50 per cent, thereby eliminating the early morning shift of workers, of which Mr. Ford never has approved.

The capacity expansion at the Rouge plant, it is understood, is designed to make possible this manufacture of 4,800 units in sixteen hours instead of twenty-four hours.

It also was revealed that, with the reopening of the St. Louis assembly plant, probably within a month, the Ford company will be carrying on manufacturing operations in twelve branch plants. The St. Louis plant will be the fourth to reopen since reorganization of branch operations in 1933.

Industry Hopes

Mr. Ford's statement that his company is "out of the depression" and plans to make at least 1,000,000 cars and trucks in 1935 was received in automotive circles in Detroit without official comment, but informally the industry's reaction was indicated as one of hope that consumer demand would require the stepping-up of output.

Other manufacturers who were in Detroit declined to be quoted concerning plans for next year, but it was pointed out in other sources that with the bulk of production concentrated in the low-price field dominated by Ford, Chevrolet and Plymouth, consumer demand for 1,000,000 Ford cars next year would mean the three low-price field leaders alone would account for close to the estimated 2,800,000 aggregate output of the industry for this year.

The general policy of the industry has been to keep output in harmony with demand and avoid the accumulation of cars for which there is no immediate market.

Chevrolet has been leading in the low price field for several years, and during the current year to date, its output has totaled, unofficially, 790,477 units against Ford's 725,000 cars and trucks. Last year, Ford output was 412,000 units in the same period, while Chevrolet produced 608,130 cars.

Plymouth, third in the leading group in the low-price field, stepped up its output from 234,214 units in the first ten months of 1933 to 335,900 in the same period this year.

$415,000,000 Will Be Expended

Mr. Ford's plan to turn out "1,000,000, cars or better" in 1935 will involve an outlay of $415,000,000, company officials reported tonight.

Here is what they say their program is expected to cost the company in its dealings with 6,008 suppliers throughout the United States:

1. Freight bills for the movement of raw and finished materials will approximate $74,000,000.

2. The sum of $100,000,000, the biggest item in the Ford budget, will go into the production of automobile bodies by Detroit body building companies.

3. Steel, iron and non-ferrous materials will take about $75,000,000, and $53,600,000 of this sum will go to buy steel in the open market. The non-ferrous metals of aluminum, copper, lead, tin and zinc are budgeted at about $12,000,000.

4. Tires will take $22,500,000, with $5,000,000 for crude rubber. And another $32,000,000 will go for the finishing of the bodies. Lumber requirements are listed at $3,000,000.

The beginning of large-scale production is planned for December, when 87,000 men will be on the payroll. The company said Detroit would supply all the labor requirements.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Greyfriars Bobby

In 1858 a young man died and was buried in the churchyard of Greyfriars, Edinburgh. "Bobby" his dog, a rough-haired Scotch terrier, followed the coffin to the grave. Thereafter, until his death 14 years later, the dog came to the cemetery every day to watch over his master's grave. Kindhearted people supplied this strange canine mourner with food and a home, and his daily presence at the grave came to be regarded as a matter of course. Nine years after his master's death "Bobby" was arrested as a vagrant and appeared in Court for lack of a license. But the Lord Provost hearing of the dog's fidelity presented "Bobby" with a collar and paid his license fee out of his own pocket.

A Monument to "Bobby's" fidelity has been erected by the Baroness Bourdett-Coutts, and can be seen opposite Greyfriar Churchyard.

Social and Personal Notes

WOMEN'S CLUB

"Amos and Andy are not newcomers to the entertainment world but had their beginning in the early American drama that developed some 10 years after the Revolutionary war, Prof. W. Bradford Smith, of the drama department of St. Paul's University, told the Tokyo Women's club Monday afternoon in the Y.W.C.A.

"Economic and social conditions," Prof. Smith declared, "conspired to give us three distinct types in early American drama. These were the frontiersman, the stage negro, and the Yankee. These types were original and thoroughly American which cannot be said for the majority of plots which were most conventional."

The frontiersman, Mr. Smith said, was first brought to the stage by the drama, "The Lion of the West" by John Kennedy who, although he was popular at the time, is all but forgotten today. In his frontiersman, a character quick with the gun, first in daring and bravery as well as one who knew the paths of the forests instinctively, Kennedy gave us a character that still lives as the hero of many beloved boys books, Mr. Smith declared.

Speaking of the Negro in the early plays, Mr. Smith explained that he took the part of the servant and his was the role to inform the audience concerning the other characters in the play. Either talking to himself or to another servant, he would gossip about the family whom he was serving until their personalities were well fixed in the minds of the audience. In adopting plays from England, the Negro always took the servant role. He remained to become the great great great grandfather of Amos and Andy, Prof. Smith said.

The Yankee type was the most important single contribution of the early American drama, Prof. Smith believed. He was first seen in "The Contrast," a play by Royal Tyler in 1787. It was the first original American comedy to be played by an American company and written by an American. Mr. Tyler was a colonel in the army who came to New York in connection with Shay's Rebellion and who, being intensely patriotic, lingered to write a play that was American. Tyler, like many of his contemporaries, wanted to do something to stem the wave of English plays that were being produced in New York at that time.

In his play, Tyler fixed the character of the Yankee for the stage—a shrewd, unpolished up-state farmer who though he seems to be making a fool of himself still gives the impression that maybe he isn't as dumb as folks think he is, and that maybe after all, his will be the last laugh. This type remained for many years.

"Though the early plays," Prof. Smith declared, "were no great literature, still they laid the foundation for the drama we have now. Without these early playwrights, we would have no Eugene O'Neill today."

He said that we think of musical comedy as something decidedly modern and smart but that musical comedy was introduced back in 1819 and that the ditty, "Home Sweet Home," was part of one of the early musical comedies.

Many of the incidents which Prof. Smith related amused his audience but none so much as the story of the penniless writers. A writer, in those days, must have labored only for the love of labor for he rarely got a penny. James Hackett, one of the leading actors of the day, made $250,000 one year. He sent a check of $500 to the author who was most surprised at such unusual generosity.

But all was not a path of velvet and roses for the early American drama. There were many who felt that the American plays were not worth their time, that they must have English drama just as they must send their children to England to be educated.

That the plays gave splendid pictures of the society and fashions of the day was evidenced as readings were given by members of the club. Mrs. John Perry Hubbard and Mrs. A. C. Buffum read an amusing sketch from "The Contrast," and Mrs. T. D. Walser read a portrayal of the Yankee character from the same play. Miss Ruth Bartlett, Miss Dorothy Parsons, and Miss Eloise Cunningham, teachers in the American School, gave a scene from the play, "Fashion."

Mrs. J. D. Hitch, Jr., presided and the program was arranged by Mrs. Bradford Smith, Miss Eloise Cunningham, Mrs. T. D. Walser, and Mrs. W. W. Parkinson.

Russia Is Being Seen Through Colored Glasses

deliver up whatever products the State may demand of them.

Allowing for differences of emphasis and interpretation, there was substantial agreement between the peasants themselves and the local Soviet authorities as to the causes of the famine. Climatic conditions, while unfavorable, had not been utterly disastrous. There had been a good deal of neglect of the fields and a great growth of weeds, largely as a result of the apathy and discouragement of the peasants, who year after year had seen the state officials take away their grain and other products at arbitrarily fixed prices in increasingly worthless paper roubles without giving them anything in the nature of a fair equivalent in manufactured goods. Consequently the yield was much lower than it would have been in normal years. Even so the peasants could have pulled through, if the State had relaxed its levies in kind of them. It did not; the exactions were carried out as ruthlessly as usual; the three or four million dead were the inevitable victims of this policy.

Could Have Been Averted

The Soviet Government could easily have averted the famine with its own resources if it had desired to do so. A complete cessation of the exportation of foodstuffs in 1932, or the diversion of a small amount of currency to the purchase of grain and provisions would have sufficed. The Soviet attitude was, I think, quite accurately summed up by Mr. Mezhuev, President of the Potava Soviet, who said to me in the course of an interview: "To have imported grain would have been injurious to our prestige. To have let the peasants keep their grain would have encouraged them to go on producing little."

The concealment of the famine was the most striking illustration of how effective the Soviet censorship can be as a veil between Soviet conditions and the outside world. With opportunity for first-hand investigation barred, it was impossible for a correspondent to risk his reputation, as well as his right to reside in Moscow, by sending out messages based on the rumors of wholesale starvation which filtered in to the Soviet capital and which might conceivably have been exaggerated.

But the time the prohibition of travel had been lifted and it was possible to verify the enormous mortality on the spot by talks with peasants and with local officials the famine belonged to history. A narrative of what has happened, in the nature of things, cannot make on the consciousness and imagination of foreign readers the effect which is produced by a description of what is happening.

A controversy grew up in the correspondence columns of a well-known British Liberal newspaper in the summer of 1933 as to whether there had been a famine in Russia; about two-thirds of the participants were sure that nothing of the kind had occurred. And the suppression of the actual facts of the great catastrophe which over took the peasant regions of southern and south-eastern Russia in 1932-1933 has made it possible for professional and amateur "friends of the Soviet Union" to pass off the death of millions of people, the greatest organized slaughter since the World War, as just a little hardship and destitution, brought on their own heads by "kulaks" or peasants who were too stupid to appreciate the advantages of collective farming.

Foes Of Mueller Create Church; Approval Asked

Effort At Coordination Termed Attempt To Set Up 'Impossible Papacy'

The dramatic struggle within the German Protestant Church aroused by the National Socialist effort to force it to conform with the totalitarian social and political system resulted today in a final—for the church—tragic schism, states an article dated Oct. 20 in The New York Times.

Assembled in the parish church at Dahlen on the outskirts of Berlin the National Free Synod debated for six hours and then adopted a solemn proclamation of independence, stating that Reich Bishop Ludwig Mueller, his Bishops and his ecclesiastical ministry have abandoned the Christian faith and gospel.

At the same time the synod notified the German Government that the pastors and laity whom it represents, constituting a great part of the active church membership, have now created their own church administration in the form of a brotherhood council, which will take over responsibility for governing the German Evangelical Church.

Free Synod's Proclamation

The proclamation states:

"Employing police restraint the Reich church government has put aside the church administrations in Bavaria, Wuerttemberg and Hesse. That has been the climax in the long standing confusion in the Evangelical Church. In view of this situation we are forced to issue the following declaration:

"The first and basic article of the Constitution of the German Evangelical Church of Sept. 11, 1933, states, 'The irrevocable basis of the German Evangelical Church is the gospel of Jesus Christ as it is found in Holy Scripture and as it has again been brought to light in the confessions of the Reformation. Thereby is the authority that the church requires for its mission defined and qualified."

"This article has been literally put aside by the teachings, laws and measures of the Reich church government.

"The Christian basis of the German Evangelical Church has been set aside.

"The National church desired by the Reich Bishop, as expressed in his slogan, 'One State, one people, one church,' means that for the German Evangelical Church the authority of the Gospels has been revoked and the church's mission has been delivered into the hands of powers of this world.

Sees an Impossible Papacy

"The unseemly absolution of the Reich Bishop and his civil administrator has created in the Evangelical Church an impossible papacy.

"Driven by a spirit of false and unscriptural revelation the church regime has punished as disobedience the struggle for the defense of the Scriptures and the confession.

"The unscriptural introduction of the worldly leadership principle in the church and the demand for unqualified obedience based on that principle have made the officers of the church subject to the church regime instead of to Christ.

"The forcing aside of the synods has left the parishes voiceless and stripped of their rights in contradiction to the teachings of the Scriptures and the reformation regarding the universal priestly duty of the laity.

"The following two articles of the proclamation define the moral and legal bases on which the independent church administration has been set up, and the final article notifies the government of the existence of the independent church and of its claim to be the genuine established Lutheran Church of Germany.

New Administration Set Up

"All our preceding protests and warnings taken from Scripture and the confessions have been without result," the proclamation says. "Contrarily, the Reich church government, employing police and political force, has continued ruthlessly its work of destroying the church.

"Therefore the church enters upon a state of emergency, forcing us to proclaim:

"We declare the constitution of the German Evangelical Church has been obliterated; its legal machinery no longer exists; the men who have seized control of the church in the Reich and the various States have through their actions withdrawn themselves from the Christian church.

"On the basis of the emergency rights of the church and of the parishes and the bearers of spiritual office true to Scripture and the Confessions, the Confessional Synod of the German Evangelical Church herewith establishes new bodies of control and leadership.

"It summons to the government and representation of the German Evangelical Church, as a league of churches loyal to the Confessions, the Brotherhood Council of the German Evangelical Church. It summons from this body the Inner Council of the German Evangelical Church to take over the administration. Both bodies have been brought together and organized on the same basis as the Confessional Synod.

"We call on the Christian parishes, their pastors and their elders, to accept no instructions from the former Reich church government or its administrative offices and to withdraw from further cooperation with those who continue to obey this church regime. We summon them to follow the instructions of the Confessional Synod of the German Evangelical Church and those bodies it recognizes.

"We submit this, our proclamation, to the Reich government. We request it to take cognizance of the final decisions therein contained and call on it to recognize that in church matters the church alone is justified to pass judgment and reach decisions upon its teachings and discipline. This recognition shall not prejudice the State's supervisory authority."

Only One Vote in Opposition

After its adoption by the 150 delegates making up the assembly the proclamation was read in a ceremonial service in the 700-year-old St. Anne's Church in Dahlen by the Rev. Dr. Karl Koch, president of the Confessional Synod. Only one vote was cast against its adoption in the final ballot.

Today's formal proclamation of the schism and the creation of an administration competing directly with the Reich Bishop and the Protestant church administration recognized by the National Socialist State presents to Chancellor Hitler one of the most difficult problems he has faced since he came into power.

Unless he finds some means of compromise, the coming struggle for control of the church income, which is generally collected in the form of a church tax by the State, promises to arouse problems that will strike at the very foundations of the totalitarian State.

The present situation may be regarded either as accidental or the inevitable result of the totalitarian principle, but Chancellor Hitler is now hopelessly involved in the same problem of religious liberty that has tormented many earlier absolute rulers and has been of such great importance in the struggle for freedom.

Indian Congress Breaks Up With Praise For Gandhi

Retiring Leader Spends Last Day Completely Remodelling Organization

The Indian Congress held recently in Calcutta broke up in a shower of valedictory compliments to Gandhi, says The Observer, London.

After having rejected on the first day one of his proposals, namely, to substitute the words "truthful and non-violent" for "peaceful and legitimate" in the definition of Congress methods, members, on realizing that his departure was definite, accepted all his other proposals, reaffirming the compulsory wearing of homespun and the spinning franchise—though, as some openly said, they have no intention of carrying out these any more than in the past, and a Socialist declared that compulsory spinning was a disgraceful hardship to impose on workers after a day's work.

Gandhi, for this part determined to show that he is retiring without pique, spent his last day in a complete remodelling of the organization, making the All-India Committee less than half its former size and reducing the delegates to open sessions from 6,000 to 2,000.

Decision to Retire

Gandhi's decision to retire has caused no surprise in the inner circle of his associates, and in view of his age has every appearance of finality.

To his friends Gandhi reveals himself as tired and completely disillusioned. India's mood, like Europe's, has changed in the last few years, and he feels himself a piece of wreckage left over by the ebbing tide of emotional idealism which swept over the world at the end of the war. He firmly believes that his faith in himself could remove mountains, and his inner consciousness produce an outward non-violent revolution.

He has long persuaded himself that the change was slowly ripening, but now realises that the movement has been the other way and that his ideas are less attractive.

Congress consists largely of extremely quarrelsome and ambitious secular politicians, whose lip-service to his ideals produced nauseating mass-corruption but no change of heart, and there is now a passionate desire for the new Parliamentary life which the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms introduced and the coming Act will develop.

Suicidal Policy

Moreover, the pretence that the reforms are a sham can no longer be maintained. Politicians realize that the party which shuts off itself from tariff-making and the possibility of distributing patronage in an era when all the services are being rapidly Indianized is committing suicide.

In this respect India has learnt its lesson, and any serious boycott of the coming reforms is improbable. The situation today largely justifies the consistent British policy of advancing self-government.

"I was blind," says Gandhi, and some believe that he now suspects his own responsibility, and that there has been a fundamental moral flaw in his preaching physical non-violence coupled with civil disobedience and boycott, which is essentially productive of spiritual violence and racial antagonism.

His favorite gospel of ameliorating the lot of the untouchable classes is shaking Hinduism to its foundations and Gandhi may yet produce a tremendous development. His name retains its magic, and Congress dislikes losing him, much as they are relieved at being rid of his unpractical idealism.

Cuban Communists May Seize Republic

Red Leader Outlines Plans He Would Institute

Seizure by the Communists of the government of Cuba in the near future was forecast on Nov. 12 by Senor Felipe Gonzalez, red leader in the island republic, in an exclusive interview with the United Press.

Senor Gonzalez said that the Cuban Communist Party now has a membership of 5,000 and that its discipline, in contrast with that of the many other factions in Cuba is "perfect."

"Economic conditions are steadily growing worse and I am confident that we will be able successfully to seize the Government soon," Senor Gonzalez said.

Once in the saddle, Senor Gonzalez would wipe out capitalism with a series of decrees nationalizing all the resources of the nation, he said. Should the reds gain power, their program would be:

Firstly, to confiscate, without compensation to the owners, all sugar and tobacco plantations, all mills and factories, all banks.

Secondly, according to the Communist program outlined by Senor Gonzalez, the red Government would repudiate the public debt, wiping out all foreign and domestic national loans.

Finally, the Communist leader said, all treaties would be denounced, particularly the newly negotiated reciprocal tariff agreement with the United States, which he charged keeps Cuba in economic vassalage to powerful American interests.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Garden Of The Hesperides

When Zeus married Hera he received the Golden Apples as his wedding present. The apples were planted and grew in the Garden of the Hesperides, where the daughters of Hesperis and the never sleeping dragon Ladon guarded them day and night. In order to gain eternal youth and immortality Hercules performed the labor of stealing the golden apples. The famous Garden of the Gods still flourishes. It is located on a fertile terrace near Benghasi, Cireanica, and is watered by the River Lethe, the Stream of Forgetfulness. I walked in the Garden and plucked the golden apples, which turned out to be plain oranges, the ancient symbol of love and fruitfulness.

"The Flight of the Bumblebee" which was included in the second part of the program, pleased the audience with its realistic effect and murmurings of summer. It was light, airy and altogether a delightful bit of fancy. "The Wind" by Vezsey was likewise a tonic to the imagination and a pleasure to the ear. The verve, dash and fire of the Dance Espanola by de Falla-Kreisler was loudly applauded and like "The Flight of the Bumblebee," encored.

Birth Of Persia's Epic Poet Marked

1,000th Anniversary Of Birth Of Firdausi Marked In U.S. By Columbia U.

Columbia University, the American Institute for Persian Art and Archaeology, the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the New York Public Library will join in a world celebration of the 1,000th anniversary of the birth of Firdausi, epic poet of Persia, it was announced according to the issue of the New York Herald Tribune. They will unite with the Persian community of New York and of the country in a series of events paralleling similar ceremonies in Persia, France, England, Russia and other countries.

The New York exercises will open at Columbia on November 8, when Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of the university, the Columbia trustees and Ghaffar Khan Djalal, Persian Minister to the United States, will receive the scholars and patrons of Persian art in the great rotunda of the Seth Low Library.

Works To Be Exhibited

Dr. A. V. Williams Jackson, professor of Indo-Iranian languages at Columbia, will speak on Firdausi, and an exhibition of manuscripts of Firdausi with miniatures and all of the printed editions of his works will be held in the Avery Library at Columbia from November 9 to 21.

Under the auspices of a committee of scholars consisting of Dr. Jackson, Dr. Richard J. H. Gottheil, Dr. Louis H. Gray, Dr. David Eugene Smith and Roger Howson, a bibliography will be published of the manuscripts, miniatures and texts of Firdausi owned in the United States. Copies will be sent to the Shah and prominent scholars in Persia.

"The celebration is but another evidence of the last few years of the high esteem in which scholars and critics of art hold the culture which we today call Persian or Iranian and of which in those distant centuries Firdausi was the story-teller," David Eugene Smith, professor emeritus at Columbia and member of the Order of Elim, First Rank, of Persia, explained.

Gathered Legends of Persia

"Firdausi gathered together the legends and traditions of his country and of the heroes and the great Mahomedans conquered the land in 657," he said. "The story of the wars and the loves of the kings and heroes of Iran he left in a long poem, "Shahnamah," which has come down to us in manuscript form and has been translated into languages of the West."

"In the literature of the West there have appeared many of the stories first told in the courts and around the campfires of the Persian highlands, finally recorded by Firdausi and through his work later carried on to later generations. English readers are familiar with the figure of Rustem, chiefly perhaps from Matthew Arnold's poem of Schrab and Rustem. The name of Jemshid has filtered through Persian poetry and is known to many of the West. Rustem is the hero of the "Shah-namah," a kind of Persian St. George, or even Hercules, and several sections of the poem have to do with the rise and fall of Jemshid."

The honorary committee in charge of the celebration includes Dr. Butler, Ghaffar Khan Djalal, Governor Herbert H. Lehman, Mayor F. H. LaGuardia, Phiroz D. Saklatvala, honorary Consul General of Persia; Edwin H. Anderson, director of the New York Public Library, and Herbert E. Winlock, director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Nazi Clergy Insist Hitler Aide Resign

German Christians Send Plea To Chancellor For Removal Of Dr. Jaeger

Chancellor Adolf Hitler has finally received from the leaders of the German Christian Society, his own Nazi Protestants, what amounts to an ultimatum demanding the immediate resignation of Dr. August Jaeger, his representative, who has functioned in the Ecclesiastical Ministry under the title of Civil Administrator.

After the German Christian leaders in the Reich Church administration had been abruptly dismissed by Dr. Jaeger recently and had been as abruptly reinstated by a governmental order, a series of negotiations began in which the government and Reich Bishop Ludwig Mueller tried to induce the German Christian leaders to compromise. Finally, Dr. Walter Kinder, head of the German Christians, and his associates, assured of the support of a majority of the members of their organization, issued a courteous but firm ultimatum, according to a Berlin dispatch to the New York Times dated Oct. 23. They told Herr Hitler, the Reich Bishop and party officials that Dr. Jaeger was seeking to form a national church in which Protestant doctrines would be subordinated to State considerations. There was, Dr. Kinder asserted, no place in such a church for the German Christian Society.

Hold Upper Hand

In view of the fact that members of the laity remaining in Bishop Mueller's church are all German Christians or their sympathizers, failure to accept the ultimatum would mean that the Bishop and Dr. Jaeger would be left alone in a church devoid of both clergy and laity.

Although they use somewhat less outspoken language, the German Christian leaders agree with the opposition clergy in regarding Dr. Jaeger as a heretic.

The German Christians are almost painfully National Socialist, but they have declared definitely that they do not intend to remain in a church in which the laity is forced to accept an ecclesiastical administration whose spiritual authority it does not recognize. Moreover, they will accept neither State interference in questions of faith nor the idea of a national church that involves such interference.

Mueller Often Ignored

This difference in views between Dr. Jaeger, as Herr Hitler's political representative, and the German leaders has paralyzed the Ecclesiastical Minister for several months. Dr. Jaeger has frequently acted on his own authority, paying less and less attention to the views of the Reich Bishop and of other members of the church administration.

Certain statements that Dr. Jaeger made in conjunction with the Reich Bishop's consecration and the German Christian conclave were an additional factor in impelling Dr. Kinder to ask for the removal. Events in Bavaria that showed there could be no doubt that the laity was opposed to the ecclesiastical ministry, combined with Dr. Jaeger's efforts to destroy the influence of the rebellious German Christian leaders, brought the crisis to its present stage.

Dr. Jaeger was forced to send his apologies to Dr. Kinder, but the Civil Administrator's resignation is now believed to be almost inevitable. Certain members of the church opposition hold, however, that the quarrel is being faked as a trap for the opposition clergy and that Dr. Jaeger intended to return anyway to his regular position as a government official.

The Reich Bishop and provincial Bishops who support or accept hm will be received by Herr Hitler Thursday afternoon. The Reich Bishop will take at that time his often-postponed oath of loyalty to the Leader.

The revolt flaring against Nazi church rule spread on Oct. 23 to the Catholic Youth, recently claimed for Hitlerism, as 30,000 delegates to a Catholic Youth Day meeting at Cologne staged tumultous demonstrations of fealty to their leaders.

The meeting, one of the most impressive held in years, gave abundant evidence that Catholics rebelling with Protestants against the Reich's church policies, plan an early offensive.

A fortnight before Baldul von Schirach, Hitler Youth leader, welcomed to Cologne "tens of thousands" of the Catholic Youth, who he said had come into the Hitler fold, but today the cheers were al for Karl Joseph Cardinal Schulte of Cologne and other church dignitaries.

After ceremonies at Cologne's cathedral the Catholic Youth procession, carrying 400 banners, moved through the streets, lined with acclaiming throngs, while police struggled to maintain the lines during the ovations given to Cardinal Schulte and others.

A police ban on outdoor activities of the Catholic Church had been lifted by the authorities to permit the procession.

Observers saw in the celebration a direct challenge to Herr von Schirach and his Hitler Youth, which demonstrated at Cologne earlier this month.

U.S. Basic Trade Policy Is Outlined

Nippon Dempo-United Press

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Secretary of State Cordell Hull said today that the "most favored nation clause," will continue to be the cornerstone of the country's foreign policy.

He said that all reciprocal agreements will be based on equality of treatment as regards tariffs, trade and finance.

The United States has made more progress in foreign trade expansion through the Yankee trading program than most of the European countries that specialize in bilateral agreements and barter arrangements.

Cost Of Austrian Army Big Burden

Nation Asks Financial Aid Of Powers Opposed To Hitler

Once more the Austrian Government is faced with the vital question: "Who's to pay the Piper?"—That is, how is the cost of the recent National Socialist uprising to be covered?

Last February, after the Government's armed clash with the Socialists, that same problem arose and the Government solved it by decreeing a special "public security tax," says a Vienna dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor. That practice, however, cannot be often repeated, for Austrians already complain of excessive taxation. Rents and other fiscal burdens in Vienna were recently increased and now a new special assessment would prove very unpopular.

Army Costs Mount

However, money must be found for the army, the auxiliary defense forces and the police. During the course of the past year, Austria's regular army has been increased by 8000 men, while the special forces, such as the Fascist Heimwehr, the Roman Catholic Sturmscharren and other similar formations have called a still larger number of men to the colors. Some observers declare that Austria now has not less than 100,000 men under arms in comparison with 22,000 a year ago.

All these soldiers require uniforms, weapons and pay. Many of them are unemployed and enlist in the Heimwehr in order to be assured of food, shelter and a few cents a day. But these expenditures require a large sum of money, not provided for in the regular budget, which the Government is finding it difficult to secure.

More Jobless

Not for a decade, it is declared, has there been so much want as at present.

Unemployment is at its high point. Official statistics show that in Vienna, the chief industrial center of Austria, there are more persons seeking work than ever before. In 1931 there were 112,234, and at present 182,081. The number of destitute seeking old age relief has mounted from 65,980 in 1931 to 95,357 in 1934.

Building in Vienna has largely ceased, reducing brick production, for example, by 80 per cent.

Exports have decreased along with imports, which reduces the number of persons employed in commerce. Freight traffic on the railroads has fallen off. The consumption of certain very important commodities has diminished, thus increasing unemployment.

Few Tourists

Two peculiarly Austrian sources of income have been very seriously affected: one is the tourist traffic and the other the sale of art products. For two years the number of foreign tourists visiting Austria has been greatly reduced, mainly because of the strife between Austria and Germany. In consequence the foreign tourist industry throughout the whole of Austria has suffered a great loss, which leaves many mountain towns in the direst need.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Ear of Dionysius

Dionysius I., tyrant of Syracuse (430-367 B.C.), kept a large number of Greek and Carthaginian captives whom he confined in the stone quarries (latomiae) near Syracuse. In order to be able to spy on their whispered conversations, he constructed a remarkable acoustic grotto, shaped like an ear, about 75 feet high. This "Ear of Dionysius" magnifies the voice about 50 times. A whisper is magnified to the proportions of a peal of thunder. Words are endlessly repeated. Dionysius sat at a small opening high up in the cavern, and as the embittered whispers of his slaves reached his ears through this curious loud speaker he would mark the whisperer for death.

The Most Miraculous Cure-All

Sylphium, the most miraculous plant in antiquity, grew only in Cirenaica. In ancient days the plant was a source of great wealth to the country, being so valuable that the King himself would guard its shipping and weighing. Likenesses of the plant were engraved on the gold coins of the country, and the list of ailments it was purported to cure have been recorded on the authority of Pliny and Younger and others. Never in history has there been a drug of such miraculous renown. It is now extinct. The last specimen was discovered in the days of Nero, and sent as a gift to the Emperor.

SCHOOL VACATION

Thanksgiving brought a holiday vacation to students in the American School in Japan.

Following an informal Thanksgiving program at the school Wednesday noon, all classes were excused for a holiday which will continue until 9 a.m. Monday.

In a brief talk on the "Spirit of Thanksgiving" during the program Wednesday, Harold C. Amos, principal of the school, praised the students for their response to an appeal from the Salvation Army. The names of nine destitute families were given the school following which the students responded with a large stock of groceries—enough to give the nine large families a hearty Thanksgiving dinner and good dinners for many days to come. In addition, the students, on their own initiative, raised ¥55 to be given by the Salvation Army to the poor families.

"In doing this," Principal Amos told the student body, "you have demonstrated that Thanksgiving means more than just a turkey dinner to you. You have caught the real spirit of Thanksgiving as the Pilgrim Fathers had it when in 1623, they invited the friendly Indians to join with them in giving thanks for an abundant harvest."

Children in the 5th and 6th grades dramatized the "First Thanksgiving Day," and the Junior High School presented a play, "A Little Pilgrim's Quest," under the direction of Miss Helen M. Lee. Other numbers on the program included songs of a Thanksgiving nature.

Posner Traces Child Crime To Faulty Schools

United Parents' Association Hears Education Official Assail Outworn Curricula

The "antiquated curricula of the public schools," the harmful effects of crime motion pictures and the policy of "leaving back," or retarding, unsuccessful pupils in order to bring about their adjustment, are the major causes of juvenile delinquency, Louis S. Posner, member of the Board of Education, said recently at the annual luncheon of the United Parents' Association in the Hotel Pennsylvania, New York City, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

"Between the inadequate good accomplished by the antiquated curricula of public schools, on the one hand," said Mr. Posner, "and the positive harm accomplished by motion pictures in general on the other, it is surprising that deliquency has not reached a far greater proportion than at present. Every school failure indicates maladjustment of one sort or another."

Luncheon Attended by 600

The luncheon was attended by more than 600 parents of school children and by many school officials. Its purpose was to acquaint the parents with the efforts of the Board of Education to adapt the school machinery to the needs of individual students.

Harold G. Campbell, Superintendent of Schools, and Stephen F. Bayne, Associate Superintendent and chairman of the Superintendents' Committee on Individualization, also spoke. Mrs. Robert V. Russell, president of the United Parents' Association, presided.

Asserting that the costs of education were only one-fifth the costs of crime, Mrs. Posner said:

"Clearly we must shift the emphasis from the punitive to the preventive, from the corrective to the constructive, from the adult to the juvenile approach. A $100 increase in the funds for education will bring about a $500 decrease in the funds spent on crime prevention."

As for the relation of retardation to delinquency, Mr. Posner said: "In two reformatories in New York City alone, between 84 per cent to 92 per cent of the inmates are children who have been 'left back' in the public schools for one or more terms. School failure must be regarded as a warning of potential danger to our children. This does not mean that retardation is the sole cause of criminality, but there exist common causative factors which underly both delinquency and retardation."

Attacks Outwarn Curricula

Many of the national ills, he said, could be traced to outworn curricula, which were antiquate even before today and its changed conditions. Fixed teaching procedures, he added, often resulted in maladaption of the children. He went on:

"I believe that the time has come when we must once for all surrender the dominating outworn theory of teaching the subject, and substitute for it the fundamentality true principle of teaching the child."

Mr. Posner believed that a sense of inferiority was bred in the child by failure in studies to which he is not suited, and that "he sullenly endures the virtual imprisonment of the schools until he is sixteen years old, with a growing sense of rebellion and revenge that finds expression first in mischief, then in petty pilferings, and finally in gang companionship and crime."

Millions of citizens were victims of the lopsided curricula of public schools, he said. Special classes were not the answer to the problem, he said, but rather an earnest effort "to fit the child to the school and not the school to the child."

Denouncing motion pitcures depicting crime as Public School Enemy No. 1, Mr. Posner characterized their production as motivated by mercenary considerations, "a menace to developing child life." He said the large majority of American-made films catered to "the curiosity and emotions of the millions who have dimes and quarters to pay the magnates who control the studios."

Finds Charatcer Undermined

"Character training and the development of right social attitudes are being undermined and even thwarted by sub-standard motion pictures," he asserted.

Parents were advised to insist on drastic changes in the curricula of the schools, to establish a clearing house for the guidance of parents on motion pictures, and to effect a combination of all agencies dealing with education, so that they might do together successfully what they had done with indifferent success by themselves.

Dr. Bayne, following Mr. Posner, almost precipitated a debate when he said: "We're not so traditional and hidebound as the public thinks. The fault of the 'movie" problem lies with the parents. How many of them take the trouble to write to the producers when a good 'movie' is presented? Let's give the right hand of fellowship to the producers of good 'movies.'

Referring to the beginning of creative education which seeks to develop the individuality of the child, Dr. Bayne said: "The school will continue to be blamed, in my opinion unjustly, for the misdoings or misachievements of children. We must bear our share of the blame, but let us not forget that since the community and the home so frequently set the ideals and the attitudes of children, the school often cannot change them."

Complete educational procedure, he said, should be along intellectual, physical, religious and social lines. The child could not be well educated unless the school, the home and other conditions of his environment worked together, he said.

After thanking the parents' group for their help to the Board of Education, Mr. Campbell said the shools must have more state aid, if they were to follow the suggestions for reorganizing the curricula, adding. "When we get back to normal times, there will be even more work to be done than there is today."

Realtors Want U.S. to Abandon Building Plans

Ask Congress To Put Funds Into Mortgage Field To Aid Owners Of Small Houses

The National Association of Real Estate Boards, the largest real estate organization in the United States, has asked the Federal government to step out of building and let private enterprise carry on this work, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

The association politely but firmly makes known its desires in suggesting that the funds which might be appropriated for government work be placed in the mortgage field for the relief of small house owners. The board also suggests that practical experience in the construction field be employed.

J. C. Bebb, president of the Producers' Council, which is a national organization of building material manufacturers, at the semi-annual meeting of the council recently took the same position. He said Congress should pass into private construction channels the money which it might be asked to appropriate for P. W. A. work. He said that his request was based on the experience of the past.

The national association has supported the Administration in all its moves directed to resuscitate construction, the mortgage market and real estate but apparently the board of governors of the association is not satisfied with the progress made toward the recovery and now asks by implication that the practical real estate man, the practical builder and the practical mortgage man be given a chance, with the cooperation of the Federal government, to handle the situation.

Practical Experience Favored

The governors of the association, called to Chicago from their homes in various sections of the country met a few days ago. The sum and substance of that meeting is contained in the five resolutions:

1. That practical experience in this definite field be drawn on for the work in hand.

2. That government help take the form of aid and economic direction, rather than that of direct government building.

3. That, retaining the advantages contained in present legislation, a Federal mortgage discount system be put into effect.

4. That R. F. C. and P. W. A. funds be used for purchase of insured home mortgages.

5. That investigation be made to clear the way toward Federal loans at a low interest rate to limited dividend housing corporations operating under supervision.

Aimed at Long Range Policies

The association explained that the resolution adopted expresses the feeling of the organization, from the practial experience of its membership, as to the specific direction which should be given the tremendously important long-range governmental policies now being formed.

A statement issued by the association says:

Housing, in any community, interlocks with all the other major factors of that community's life, including all the physical and social services of the local government, as for example, eduation. Its successful development requires much more than acquisition of land and construction of buildings. It requires detailed knowledge of the local market and of local habits of living. New housing, therefore, should be constructed under the immediate direction and control of persons having seasonal experience and intimate knowledge of their own communities.

The association had advocated consistently for a number of years that the Federal government should assume economic direction in the real estate mortgage field through a central mortgage discount bank, just as it assumes such direction in the field of short-term credit through the Federal Reserve System. Such a discount bank or system is needed, to be joined with existing legislation, to form a comprehensive long-term credit system.

Federal Competition Proposed

The association feels that the true function of government would best be achieved through its giving such economic direction, rather than through the government itself becoming a landlord and competing with that group of citizens who are today carrying the major portion of the support of all local government.

A committee consisting of Edward A. MacDougall, New York, chairman of the association's committee on housing; Walter S. Schmidt, Cincinnati, chairman of its committee on real estate finance, and J. C. Nichols, of Kansas City, Mo., drafted the resolution, in text as follows:

Whereas, it is now a generally accepted fact that the re-establishment of a nation-wide market for sound real estate mortgages is required.

The nation's greatest asset is real estate.

New homes and certain other buildings are required.

Methods must be found to provide them.

Whereas, the National Association of Real Estate Boards representing 500 important urban centers of the United States, has given, over a long period, intensive study to the mortgage problem and some five years ago recommended the creation of a Federal Mortgage Bank of Discount, supported by the government and covering the entire mortgage field, as the only available means of maintaining fluidity in the flow of mortgage money;

And, whereas, the Federal government, recognizing both the financial problem and the necessity of stimulating employment through the encouragement of building operations, has adopted various alternate expedients in an endeavor to meet the situation;

And, whereas, it is obvious that these measures as constituted do not offer an adequate solution of the problem:

Want Laws Amended

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the National Association of Real Estate Boards reiterate its position and request that the practical judgment of men of long experience in the real estate field be utilized to the end of developing a plan for combining or coordinating the various agencies created and for modifying and amending existing legislation so that it be adapted to serve the necessary end.

And be it further resolved, that we re-affirm our opinion that the proper action of government lies in helps, safeguards and economic direction supplied by it to private enterprise and that a Federal discount system, retaining the advantages contained in present legislation, would accomplish this result.

And be it further resolved that in view of the need for immediate action that the R. F. C. and P. W. A. employ presently and in the future substantial funds in commitment upon and purchase of, insured mortgages provided under the Federal housing act.

The River of Oblivion

Lethe, the Stream of Forgetfulness, still rolls its silent and forgetful waters in an underground cavern near Bengasi, Cirenaica. The river was very famous in antiquity. Its waters had the power to make those who drank it forget their former existence. Voyagers to the Elysian fields drank it to forget their earthly sorrows, those returning to the upper regions drank it to forget the Elysian pleasures. When I entered the cavern of Lethe, realizing that this was the River mentioned by Plato 25 centuries ago, I felt like one treading the soil of Eternity.

New Play, "Eating Beef"

At the Shimbashi Embujo from December 7th, the Zenshinza company will perform. "Ushiwoku," (Eating Beef) a new play by Yoshiko Kitamura, will be given, after which a drama by Shin Hasegawa will be presented. His plays have been performed on more than one occasion by this company as he is in great sympathy with the members who are ronins in the Kabuki world, having rebelled against Shochiku to lead an independent existence.

Miss Yaeko Mizutani is unable to play with the Shimpa Company at Meijiza in December, since she is now in the midst of a motion picture production at the Shochiku studios. She is being filmed in "Tojin Okichi," based on the Kichi of Shomodo, whether of truth or fiction, who is supposed to have been associated with Townsend Harris.

FANCY DRESS PARTY

Some will come in crinoline, some in glittering beaded skirts, at least one little girl will be Russian Ballet dancer while others will look like children of the moon at the fancy dress ball which the Ministering Children's League of Yokohama will give Saturday afternoon.

The party will begin at 2:45 p.m. All the children in their beautiful and original costumes, will proudly parade before the judges. There will be several dances and of course, the prizes for the winning costumes. The afternoon's fun will also include a candy stall, a doll stall, dips, a woolies' stall and tea.

The Ministering Children's League of which the Yokohama organization is a branch, was founded in 1885 by the late Countess of Meath. The first branch was formed in London—now there are branches all over the world.

The league stands for:

The promotion of kindness, unselfishness, and the habit of usefulness amongst the young in their own homes, in order to form unselfish characters.

The encouragement of young people to take an active interest in the needs of their parish or district.

The creation in the minds of members of an earnest desire to help all who are in need.

The Yokohama has about 80 members and about 72 associate adult members. Bi-weekly meetings or work-parties are held at the Christ Church hall. The older girls are taught sewing, embroidering, sometimes cooking. Frequently first aid demonstrations are given. The older boys are being instructed in wood-carving. The articles they make such as bread boards and trays, belong to the M.C.I. They are sold at the carnivals and fetes held twice a year, as is also the work of the girls. There is a kindergarten class for the smaller children. Those of the small tots who are able to, are taught how to knit and to make simple useful articles.

On alternate Mondays, sewing parties are held with the associate members joining in the activity. The proceeds of the different sales and fetes go to supporting a coat in the M.C.L. home at Ottershaw, Surrey, England. Yokohama has been supporting a cot since 1912. The branch also suports local Japanese charities such as the Yokohama School for the Blind, the Milk Center, the Orphanage, the Kobokwan, Miss Henty's Settlement, Miss Robert's Maternity Home School, and others.

Mrs. B. R. Berrick is the president, Mrs. H. Milles, treasurer; Mrs. F. C. Thompson, acting secretary.

Powers Speed Arms Program, Survey Shows

U.S. Foreign Policy's Survey Reveals Figures Far Above Pre-War Levels

Feverish armament by world powers against threats of war edging over the horizon of strained political alignments in Europe and the far east has brought military expenditures far above pre-war levels, a survey made public recently by the Foreign Policy association, says the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune.

Graphic representation of the military preparations is given in a table comparing 1934 expenditures with the arms outlay in 1913, when unrestricted competition reached its peak. The table, which lists expenditure in millions of national currency, follows:

Nation—	1913	—National currency— (in millions) 1934	% increase
France	1,807	2,273	25.8
Italy	927	1,171	26.3
Great Britain	77	114	24.8
Russia	1,150	1,795	39.9
United States	244	711	190.9
Japan	191	935	388.0

Germany Shows Decrease

Germany, still bound by the restrictions of the Versailles treaty, alone shows a decrease in military expenditures. Despite the limitations the expenditures are only 23.3 per cent less than the total of the great imperial army in 1913, according to the report.

Further emphasis of the extent of the arms race is made in a second table which gives the percentage relationship of national budgets and defense expenditure. The table, also in millions of national currency, follows:

Nation—	Ttl. Natl. Budget	Defense Expenditure	Pct.
France	50,162	11,156	22.3
Germany ...	6,458	1,104	17.1
Great Britain	698	114	16.4
Italy	20,036	4,299	20.8
Japan	2,142	937	43.7
United States	3,960	711	17.9
Russia	(Not available)

The advent of Hitler closely followed by Germany's withdrawal from the disarmament conference a year ago spurred warlike maneuvers in Europe.

Other nations raced to gird themselves against the threat of armed Nazi Germany, according to the association.

Russia Increases Forces

A lesser impetus, considered in the study as charged with impending strife, has been Jugoslavia's opposition to Italy's military measures. This is tangled with the patent rivalry of France and Italy to dominate central Europe.

In the far east Japan's intense military preparations in the entrance into Manchuria in 1931 has brought a forward stride in Russian outlay with the concentration of 500 airplanes and other armed forces along the eastern border of Siberia. The United States has been drawn into this highly volatile field, according to the survey, by Japan's demand for full naval parity at the London naval conference.

Concentration of air power and war material in the current period of military activity is regarded as striking in the study. It points out that in 1914 European powers chiefly were concerned with increasing their man power.

In 1934, while reliance continues on mass armies, it is said military effort is being directed toward restoration of the mobility of land forces and the developing of air forces. Increasing amounts are being devoted to the building of tank units and the motorization of cavalry and infantry.

Compares Air Forces

The report states that accurate comparison of the world's leading air forces is not possible. Latest figures are given as: France, 3,000 planes of all types; Russia, between 2,8000 and 3,000; United States, 2,468. Japan 1,600; Italy 1,500, and Great Britain, 1,400.

The report reviews the post-war military developments in each of the great powers. These are summarized as follows:

Germany—Under Nazi nationalism, the small standing treaty army has been intensively drilled to move at great speed against poorer trained mass armies and to deliver a crushing blow by efficient use of modern war material.

Budget estimates have increased from 482 million marks for 1934 to 654 million for 1935 in the army and for the navy from 186 to 236 million marks. Even greater increase is reflected in air estimates which jumped from 77 to 210 million marks.

Keeping Peace In Saar Till Vote Is Delicate Task

British Diplomat With Other European Colleagues Has Almost Unique Task

Mr. Geoffry G. Knox, an Englishman, is, with his colleagues—Yugoslav, French, Saarlander, Finnish—responsible for the administration of this area. It is a curious, almost unique, task. He possesses, in many domains, virtually dictatorial power, says Sisley Huddleston in a despatch to the Christian Science Monitor. There is, to all intents and purposes, no popular restraint on—to employ an expression which is deprecated but is convenient—is his actions. He is answerable only to the League.

Treasures

The residence of the "Governor" on the great Schlossplaz, surrounded by governmental buildings, with the statue of Bismarck sternly looking down. It is to be distinguished—as I was informed by a passer-by from whom I asked directions—by its covering foliage. Not an imposing residence viewed from the exterior; it might be that of any well-to-do merchant. But once inside there is a spaciousness about the high-ceilinged rooms which redeems them from banality.

Besides, the "Governor" has brought with him many of his personal treasures. For my part I could not, as we sat after lunch in the library, refrain from handling the precious books, ranging from the fifteenth century, some of them with beautiful Renaissance bindings, which lined the walls and lay on the tables.

To tell the truth, most of our conversation was about books, until it wandered away to reminiscences of life in Constantinople, and in Madrid where I had met him during the Revoluion. Of the Saar itself we said little.

It should be made clear that Mr. Knox would scarcely agree with the predictions of the plebiscite I have put forward. Nor is it my business to reveal his opinion. His function is to carry on without bias, without preference, social or political, for the various parties. The reward is abuse from all sides. And that is a proof of his success.

A tall middle-aged man who has preserved a youthful appearance and an enviable slenderness, erect in bearing, with clean-cut pinkish features, hair brushed back from high forehead, well-groomed, usually dressed in the orthodox black coat and striped trousers, it would be difficult o take him for for anyhing other han a British diplomatist. His manner is at once correct and cordial. His interests are wide, and his conversation is easy and extensive in range. His French is perfect, and his German—I am assured—nearly perfect.

He Dodged

When he first came to the Saar a tremendous effort was made to place him in the center of a social circle which was naturally 100 per cent German. In talking with members of this circle, I detected a note of regret. Somehow they had failed to make him "one of them." The propagandist purpose of the drawing-room had been as effective as they wished. Mr. Knox accepted their invitations; he went everywhere; but somehow a coolness fell between them. Why? they asked me, pained and puzzled.

The answer appeared plain enough to me, but I could not give it. Let us call it their over-eagerness. In any case, they now reproach Mr. Knox with being anti-German.

Before me is a stack of petitions, protests, communications on all kinds from the Saar organizations. They are usually prefaced by the commentaries of Mr. Knox, for it is through him that they must be transmited to the League. There are allegations, some of the most sensational character, grave charges against the police authorities; and to them the "Governor" is bound to reply.

Issues Debated

Something resembling a debate has been instituted between the Deutsche Front, in particular, and the commission. It is unfortunate, but in view of the over-zealous conduct of the Deutsche Front it is hard to see how relations could be otherwise than strained. The case of the Deutsche Front is, in my opinion, far too good to be spoiled by this unhappy quarrel with the authorities.

The Deutsche Front, which claims to include the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants, is National Socialist. That it should be in the closest touch with the Hiler Government is not surprising. But there are complications which are regarded by those whose duty it is to assure order as culpable. For instance, it is asserted that young Saarlanders are trained in so-called labor camps over the German border in the use of arms. Obviously, Mr. Knox must either abdicate or take every precaution against terrorism, against a coup d'etat. Compromising documents have been discovered in the course of perquisitions. In short, with an inflammable public sentiment, and with a few fanatics prepared to stop at nothing in their impatience, there rests upon the shoulders of Mr. Knox perhaps a heavier responsibility than is borne by any other man at this time.

Tenant's Utopia

Jacob Fugger of Augsburg, the first modern millionaire was a pioneer in community housing. In 1519 he ordered the construction of a series of 53 houses of 2 apartments each for the benefit of worthy laborers and artisans. The rent was fixed at one Mark (about 40 cents in American money3. The only other condition was that the tenant recite one Lord's prayer, one Ave, and one Confession of Faith daily to the memory of the founder.

The houses stand to this day. For 415 years the deserving Catholic families inhabiting the Fuggerei have been paying the same nominal rent and will probably continue to do so as long as the city of Augsburg will endure.

Illegal To Be Born

Until 1806 the province of Westphalia, Germany was still dominated by the primitive German law of serfdom, making all women of a district the personal property of the lord of the estate. Marriage licenses could only be granted by the Lord, who could also withhold his consent to the birth of a child. If a child was born before the landowner's consent was obtained the mother was liable to imprisonment and a fine. This law was abolished after Napoleon defeated Prussia in 1806.

Brown Traces US Coin Motto To Its Own Seal

University Believes 'In God We Trust' Was Taken From Insignia Of 1834

Historians in the United States are wondering whether the motto, "In God We Trust," fixed to the seal of Brown University, inspired the use of the same motto on the nation's coins, where it first appeared just before the Civil War, says a recent article in the New York Herald Tribune.

Brown had used the motto thirty years earlier. A study of the university's official emblem, which is 100 years old this fall, brought this possibility to light. Inquiry into the history of Brown's first two seals also has revealed interesting facts concerning the university's infancy.

Motto on Seal in 1834

The seal of Brown Universiy, ordered by the corporation on September 4, 1834, carries a central shield below which there is inscribed the Latin phrase, "In Deo Speramus," which can be translated as "In God We Hope," or as "In God We Trust."

Two-cent bronzepieces issued after an act of Congress on April 22, 1864, first carried "In God We Trust." Two later acts, one passed in 1865 and the other in 1873, legalized the motto for other coins. Today the familiar inscription is known to every schoolboy.

History points to Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury under Lincoln, as the man who was directly responsible for the pledge to the Deity on United States coins. Further investigations have revealed interesting connections between Chase, the State of Rhode Island and the university immediately preceding motto's appearance on the coinage."

For years Chase was a close friend of the wealthy and influential Sprague family in Rhode Island, a family which often entertained Brown's executives and gave the university financial support. Chase was a frequent visitor in Providence and at the magnificent Sprague mansion in Narragansett Pier, where his daughter, Catherine, probably met Governor William Sprague of Rhode Island, whom she married on November 12, 1863. Two years earlier Brown had awarded the Governor an honorary Master of Arts degree.

Chase, an Episcopalian, first drew up orders for a religious motto on coins in a letter to James Pollock, director of the mint, on November 20, 1861, less than three months after Brown had honored his future son-in-law. Governor Sprague's honorary degree certificae, which. Chases probably saw, bore the Brown seal with its motto.

Ordered Phrase Used on Coins

Four weeks after his daughter's marriage Chase again wrote to Pollock, commenting upon the mottoes which the director of the mint had submitted, saying that the one to be used "with the shield. . . should be changed so as to read 'In God We Trust.'"

The new coins authorized in 1864 not only bore the inscription "In God We Trust" but carried a shield similar in outline to the shield in the center of Brown University's official insignia.

Further speculation on a possible like between the seal and coin motto centers around the associations of Chase and John Hay, of the class of 1858, who was private secretary to Lincoln in 1861 and held other major positions in Washington between 1863 and 1864. Other Brown men were in the capital at the same time.

Even if Chase borrowed the Brown motto for the coinage, the university in turn is known to have copied it from the arms of the "Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," where the inscription appears as "In Te Domine Speramus" in 1715 and as "In God We Hope" in 1776.

The shield on Brown's seal, a red cross on a white background, has been an emblem of English-speaking people since the Crusades. The four open books between the arms of the cross represent Oxford and Cambridge, the two leading universities in England; and Harvard and Yale, Brown's nearest neighbors in the United States. The sun above the shield symbolizes the light of knowledge. Around the edge of the seal is written on a wreath, "Sigilum Universitas Brunensis"—"Seal of Brown University."

Paris Alarmed As Nations Arm, Recalling 1914

But France Itself Joins 'Prepared' Nationalism, Likened To Pre-War Trend

When Marshal Henri Petain, War Minister, asked the Chamber of Deputies commiitee recently for an 800,000,000-franc increase in military expenditures, designed in part to accelerate the production anl modernization of France's war materials, he gave a striking confirmation to the French official concern about the current state of Europe.

Likewise it is now regarded as only a question of time in Paris when the period of compulsory military service will be increased, probably from one year to two, says Mr. Leland Stowe, Paris Correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune.

While these steps and trends are purely precautionary, it is nevertheless true that they are being paralleled in Germany and elsewhere. It is also noteworthy that similar developments characterized the pre-war period of 1911 to 1914.

To the objective student of current European politics, the present steady trend toward re-armed nationalisms would by no means justify an alarmist viewpoint. It would, however, seem to dictate a realistic awareness of the dangerous drift toward reliance on arms by governments throughout this Continent. It offers a stern reminder that war is not always caused by volition, but as often by fear and conflicting irreconcilable policies.

Worse Outlook Feared

Such fear and such policies constitute, in fact, the real dangers in Europe's contemporary dilemma, nor can one foresee any immediate future when they will become less acute than now. Unforunately, all signs point to their probable aggravation. Without crying "Wolf! Wolf!" Without being in any degree emotional, it would perhaps be prudent to regard the coming winter with a factual summary of the obstacles to be met.

Two of these obstacles to a return to better international relations lie just ahead. One is the far-from-settled question of the true responsibilities for the assassination of King Alexander of Yugoslavia and Louis Barthou, French Foreign Minister, in Marseilles. Second is the Saar plebscite and the international complications it is likely to touch off. It is obviously possible, though it may not yet be probable, for either of these problems to precipitate military interventions of some sort.

Powers Linked to Assassins

As for the murderers of King Alexander, here is a widespread conviction in France that they were facilitated in perfecting their plot by the Hungarian government's leniency; that some of the plotters had relations with Nazi representatives in Germany, and that others had received monetary assistance from the Italians.

As for the Saar, in the case of serious social disorders there, the League Council long ago gave the Saar Commission authority to call in French troops for policing the district, and this week it is understood that French army officials were instructed to be prepared to act if such an appearance were made. Although such intervention might not technically constitute a French occupation of the Saar, and although it would be resorted to only under great necessity, in any case the possible repercussions in Germany in such an event cannot be minimized.

Other Influences

After these two obstacles to the reestablishment of European understanding, must also be listed the precarious position of Austria's present government; the weakened authority of Yugoslavia, ruled by a regency and the boy king; the marked lack of improvement in France-Italian relations, and the serious shift of Poland into Germany's diplomatic orbit.

None of these situations tends to bolster either European confidence or European peace. As the winter of 1934-'35 sets in, it looms indubitably as the most critical winter which Europe has known since 1919.

Institute Thinks Recovery Awaits Decline in Prices

But Doubts Price Recession In Near Future Because Of Costs

The current curtailment of demand for goods should not only halt the upward price movement, but it should eventually lead to a drop in the price level, in the opinion of the Alexander Hamilton Institute in its current bulletin, according to a recent New York dispatch of the Christian Science Monitor. It adds, however, that the various obstacles which stand in the way of a lower price level "mean that full recovery from the depression in likely to be postponed for some time."

The institute attributes the failure of the recovery movement to show any marked progress this year to a considerable extent on the advance in the price of steel from a level "that was already too high."

Sees Low Production Rate

If the general price level does not drop, "production will continue at a relatively low rate because no marked rise in the real price level is in immediate prospect," the bulletin says. "It is not likely that the nation will endure indefinitely a low rate of production for the sake of high prices.

"It is questionable, however, whether much of a price recession will occur in the near future. The supply of agricultural products is small because of the drought and the Government's acreage curtailment experiment and this situation cannot be remedied until next season. The prices of farm products will consequently tend to remain high until next summer although it is possible some recession may occur before that time since this year's shortage may have been overdiscounted.

"With the prices of farm products remaining at a relatively high level, no great decline can be expected soon in the prices of manufactured goods because of the cost of raw materials. In addition, a reduction in factory wage rates is not likely to be accomplished quickly."

Referring to the high price of steel as a big factor in the curtailment of demand and steel mill activity, the institute points out that the average price of steel this year will be only 8.3 per cent lower than 1929 when the price was 2.297 cents per pound. This compares with an estimated reduction of 42.8 per cent in the national income from 1929.

The Wage Rate Factor

"An increase in the annual output of steel in 1935 over 1934 will depend almost entirely upon a reduction in steel prices no great increase in the national income is in prospect," it continues. "In fact, it is possible that, if prices are not reduced, steel production next year will fall below this year's output since two years of expansion often result in a surplus which curtails the market for new production in the third year.

"The chief obstacle to a reduction in steel prices is the high level of wage rates at the present time. Average earnings per worker in August amounted to 65.0 cents per hour or only slightly less than the 1929 earnings of 67.4 lents per hour. It should not be impossible, however, to overcome labor's opposition to lower wage rates. It would be to labor's advantage to accept lower wage rates for the sake of lower prices and increased production."

The Father Of 19 Derby Winners

In 1876 Johann Langer of Nuremberg, Germany, received the news of the English Derby result at the same time that he was apprised of the birth of his first son. The father was so elated that he named his first born Kisber-Kincsem, after the phenomenal Derby winner that year. Kincsem's owner was so surprised at this tribute that he paid the father a visit, which attained the widest publicity. 18 more sons were born to Langer and as each hapless youngster came into the world, the father wished upon him the name of the year's Derby winning horse.

A $15,000 Pumpkin

The $15,000 pumpkin was grown by the Government Experimental Station of Mataranka, in an arid section of the Australian interior. The experiment was designed to introduce the pumpkin to that region.

The City of Trousered Women

Champery is a summer resort in the Swiss Alps, lying at the foot of the Dent du Midi, in the Canton of Valais. 400 years ago its women solved the problem of feminine equality by donning trousers and assuming all the tasks of masculine labor. To this day they tend their hers, cut hay and do all the chores as the equal of men and in perfect freedom of movement. And they are still their menfolk's equal in the custom of wearing men's garb.

Feminist Program Gets New Impetus

Women Leaders In Chile See Advance By Coordinating Their Activities

Feminine leaders in Chile see in the organization of the Accion Nacional de Mujeres de Chile the greatest step ever registered in the coordination of women's political, social and economic activities in the country.

Following the recent concessions to the feminine movement, including that of the municipal vote and the married women's property law it has become apparent to organization leaders that more rapid progress can be obtained by unification and it is for this purpose that the Accion Nacional de Mujeres de Chile has been started, says a recent article in the Christian Science Monitor.

The significance of this coordinating movement was not lost upon the historic political parties and the national press featured the news of its formation. El Mercurio, doyen of the South American press, printed the Women's Party program on its front page, displaying the most prominent points in three columns of heavy type.

Education Tops List

The program, or manifesto of the Accion Nacional de Mujeres de Chile was divided into five categories—social, educational, economic, social welfare and political. First place and the greatest consideration were given to education, after which there was a long but comprehensive study of economic problems. The following is a compendium of the principal of their program points:

Social—Defense of the family is the pivot of the state: legalization of all religious marriages; the perfection of legislation for the protection of minors; legal punishment of those who abandon their family responsibilities; strict censorship of movies; revision of the alcoholic laws; and the suppression of phonographic literature.

Educational.—Freedom of education and no discrimmination in state subventions to scholastic establishments; participation of heads of families in educational councils; revision of feminine education, to equip women for household duties as well as for professional life; night schools for domestic employees; suppression of coeducation in primary and secondary schools; a rural curriculum for rural classes; better pay for teachers.

Aid for Women Workers

Economic—Legalization of the family wage and establishment of compensation funds in branches of industry which employ women to enable a working mother to maintain her home and family; greater protection for domestic servants; prevention of child labor; cheaper and better housing for the poor with emphasis on family proprietorship to encourage home building; reduction of inheritance duties to stimulate savings; women managers for factories where women are employed.

SUCCESSFUL BAZAAR

When all the money was counted that was taken in Saturday at the German Christmas Bazaar, it was discovered that ¥6,000 had been made at the bazaar!

This far exceeded the fondest hopes of the 50 women who worked shoulder to shoulder for several weeks that the bazaar might be a success. More than 500 persons visited the bazaar during the first hour it was opened Saturday and a continuous stream of visitors poured in and out of the German club until a late hour. In the evening, an auction was held and dolls were sold at fabulous prices, it is whispered.

The ¥6,000 made Saturday is more than has been cleared at any other bazaar in the history of the German colony in Tokyo.

DIDN'T WANT MUCH!

If the Foreign Office was amused at the recent request of a young lady in America, it didn't let on. Instead it soberly turned the request over to the International Children's and Women's society which very seriously did what it could in answer. This is what the young lady, who lives in Clarendon, Va., asked:

"Will you please send me the history of Japan. And will you please write in the English language because I do not know your language. And will you include these things in what you write: Japanese people, customs, population, government, religion, architecture, international relations, leaders, locations of seaports, rivers and cities, occupations, education."

Then the young lady, who evidently is a student judging from the last line, finished her order up with, "and if you have any other material, please send it. I want it for a history report so send it quick as possible please."

The International Young Women's and Children's Society, after what must have been a long sigh, sent the student an armful of current magazines and several history books.

Haiti Again Rules Self Without U.S. Guidance

vision have brought order out of the chaos of Haiti's financial affairs. A far-reaching fiscal reorganization has reduced the public debt from $30,722,000 at the time of the intervention to $12,260,000. For the first time in her history as a republic, Haiti has been kept financially sound. In line with the Haitianization of the other government services, more power over finances has been relinquished to the Haitians. This power has been no strain on the national credit, no waste of the country's resources, and no increase in the public debt.

The withdrawal of our marines leaves only one formal tie by which the United States continues to exercise any control over Haitian affairs. This amounts to little more than a continuation of the customs receivership until the final repayment of the loans to the National City Bank in accordance with previous guarantees to bondholders. The ownership and management of the Banque National de la Republique d'Haiti by the National City Bank annoyed Haitian nationalists, and there is now before the Haitian Senate a bill, already approved by the Chamber of Deputies, for the purchase of this bank by the Haitian Government.

What of the future of Haiti? Time alone will tell whether enduring foundations have been laid for stable self-government.

The tangible benefits of intervention are everywhere apparent today. The intangible benefits are largely psychological. For two decades the Haitian peasant has worked his little patch of ground in peace and has enjoyed the fruits of his labors. He has been gradually emancipated from the subservience to which centuries of exploitation had accustomed him. He loves his new freedom; he wants things to continue as they are; he is a part of the new generation that would lend little support to revolution.

Prospective for Tranquility

A possible obstacle in the course of Haiti's progress is the attitude of her upper classes. There is no planter class and only a small middle class, chiefly because of the tradition that the attainment of the position of a "gentleman" comes only through identification with one of the so-called learned professions. Such education as existed prior to 1915 was along classical lines; the towns are still oversupplied with a white-collar class composed of lawyers, architects and perforce, politicians.

In the professional politicians lies the greatest threat to future tranquillity in Haiti. The test will probably not come before 1938, when national elections will be held. If, until that time, the present government services function smoothly and meet their payrolls promptly, the Haitian ship of State will cross the first shoal without grounding.

In the American-trained Haitians—the doctors, nurses, engineers, Gardes, agricultural specialists, technicians and teachers—there is keen enthusiasm for the hard work that must yet be done in their country; though their example has come a more widespread appreciation of the dignity of labor. In this lies the hope of the future.

League Gives Technical Aid To Rural China

Whole Face Of Country May Be Changed By Reconstruction Program

It is not generally recognized what valuable technical help is given by the League of Nations to China in the development of rural construction, land reform, water conservancy, roadbuilding, fuel, finance, hygiene and intellectual cooperation. The whole face of China may be changed by this collaboration, says a report from Geneva to the Christian Science Monitor.

The technical agent, Dr. L. W. Rajchman, who has been directing the League mission in China, has returned to Geneva, but China has decided to invite the Secretary-General of the League, Joseph Avanol, to continue the collaboration.

The Intellectual Cooperation Organization will take an active part in the work of the employment bureaus for intellectual and technical workers which the Chinese Government has decided to establish at Nanking and in the west, in order to bring the vocational training of Chinese students in Europe and the United States more closely into line with the current needs of economic reconstruction in China.

Communications

The activity of the Communications and Transit Organization has been sucessfully directed toward cooperation with the Road and Water Conservancy services of the Chinese National Economic Council; a group of experts appointed by the organization is to undertake very shortly, at the request of the Chinese Government, a thorough investigation on the spot of various problems.

Except in some specialized domains, the number of Chinese citizens capable of participating in the economic reconstruction of their country is steadily increasing. Progress in this direction would be still more rapid if the Chinese administrations and their specialists could more easily avail themselves of the experience of administrations and institutions in other countries, it is pointed out by those seeking to advance this exchange.

As regards rural reconstruction and land reform, the committee of three for the study of land problems was definitely constituted; $80,000, has been appropriated for a nation-wide investigation of rural economy with particular attention to the question of tenancy. The 6500 "crop reporters" attached to the National Agricultural Research Bureau will be utilized for this purpose.

Rural Reconstruction

In the scheme of rural reconstruction in the Central and Southern Provinces, notably Kiangsi, definite progress has been made, particularly as regards rural education, cooperative societies and rural welfare centers.

But it is in the North Western Provinces, including Shensi and Kansu, that the greatest effort is being made. In this vast area, which is the size of France and Germany combined, the population is generally sparse and the tilling of wide tracts of the country is possible only by the maintenance of an irrigation system, although in the valleys various crops, including cotton, are abundant. Owing to frequent droughts and undeveloped communications, famine has occurred periodically in these regions throughout Chinese history.

Among the more important developments of recent months is the decision of the standing committee of the National Economic Council to make the council responsible for all water conservancy questions throughout the country. In this connection the arrival of the experts of the League, which is now being prepared by consultations with the Chinese engineers at present in Europe, is expected to be of the greatest value in framing the technical policy to be followed and determining a priority list for projects to be undertaken.

London's Stand At Naval Parley Held Bid to U.S.

British Expected To Ask Favors For Supporting America Against Japan

The course of the conversations on naval limitation at London during the fortnight preceding November 6 among representatives of the United States, Great Britain and Japan, abundantly justified the forebodings of those who considered it miraculous if there should emerge anything resembling an agreed upon agenda for next year's naval conference, said Mr. Harold E. Scarborough in a special dispatch as of the same date to the New York Herald Tribune, which follows.

The Japanese have duly stated their claim for a fleet equal to the British or the American. The American delegation has, as anticipated, made plain its unalterable opposition to any drastic revision of the 5-5-3 ratios established at Washington and extended to London nine years later. This alone would seem to justify the description of a "deadlock" which has been widely applied to the negotiations.

Nevertheless, the American delegates have found one cause for consolation thus far. It is that the British have lined up squarely with the Americans in their desire not only to keep the treaty ratios undisturbed but in their inability to accept the whole Japanese thesis of naval limitation by global or total tonnage rather than by categories of warships; and in their refusal to consider the Japanese plan to classify warships as offensive and defensive weapons.

Although none of the American delegates would admit it, they were, when they came to London, a little nervous about the British attitude. Probably because the British were known to agree with the Japanese about the desirability of smaller and less heavily armed battleships and cruisers, there was a certain apprehension lest Whitehall should also be found willing to concede something in the way of higher ratios for Japan.

Anglo-Japanese Pact Was Rumored

During the first few days of the conversations, rumors flew thick and fast about negotiations for a renewed Anglo-Japanese alliance. It was recalled that British relations with Russia was still rather strained; what, therefore, would be more natural than that the British should seek in Japan a counterbalance to Soviet ambitions?

Finally, a tour of a number of British industrialists through Japan and Manchoukuo—coupled with the rather overexuberant utterances attributed to some members of that mission—seemed admirably to fit the general picture. It was, therefore, a definite relief to the American negotiators when they found the British just as unreceptive to Japanese proposals as the Americans were:

Yet, since altruism is not a quality predominant in international affairs, there has naturally been a tendency to inquire whether, in return for this support, the British hope to obtain more favorable American consideration for any of their own projects.

British Look to Washington

Although thus far the British have not had to bring forth any outline of their own views on naval limitation, there is a certain anticipation here they will feel that their desire for more cruisers than are permitted by the London treaty may now receive more favorable consideration in Washington.

As is well known, the Admiralty would like to increase its present allowance of fifty cruisers to at least seventy. Under the so-called escalator clause of the London treaty, such building up could be carried out, but the Cabinet would rather not invoke that clause if it could avoid it. In some quarters here it is now felt that the United States may be less wedded to holding down British cruiser tonnage—which automatically means American tonnage also—than it was even last July; and that whether or not the present conversations result in a plan for a full-dress naval conference this country will have obtained at least the tacit withdrawal of the American objection to an increase in Anglo-American cruiser fleets.

A Human Hen

Mother Biddy Cassells was born in the small town of Lisenagear, County Cavin, Ireland in 1835 and died there in 1908. When she was 67 years old, she disappeared in the spring and was absent for three weeks. At the end of that time she came out of her hen-house with 100 baby chicks swarming about her. She admitted that she had hatched them all by sitting upon some of the eggs and keeping the folds of her dress about the others.

1000 Miles in 250 Hours

William Butler's amazing feat in pedestrianism took place on the Vetch Field, Swansea in Aug.-Sept. 1896 when the athlete was over 50 years old. The task was to cover 1000 miles in 1000 consecutive quarter-hours. Butler would cover the mile in about half the allotted time and would then be permitted to rest during the balance of the quarter. At the end of each 15 minutes his trainer would rouse him to continue on the next mile. The feat attracted large crowds of spectators, and many thousands thronged to see the last few miles. Although he had had only snatches of a few minutes consecutive rest during the 10 days of his famous walk, he was able to cover the last mile in 8 minutes. An enthusiastic throng carried him on their shoulders to the local Music Hall where he was accorded an uproarious reception. The admission charged at the gate is said to have netted the athlete about $2500.

FAN ROMANCE

Miss Florence Wells, prominent Tokyo educator and writer, told the story of the fan in a lecture sparkling with humor and amusing anecdotes and made colorful by the display of scores of fans varying from two inches in height to one more than four feet in height at the Tokyo Women's club Monday afternoon at the Y.W.C.A.

"The fan," Miss Wells said in introduction, "is a year around article. Sunday there were 100 weddings in Tokyo and at each ceremony the bride and groom carried a fan. A wedding guest would rather stay home than appear without a fan for at such an occasion, a fan is the expression of congratulations.

"Guides at the famous shrines point to things with their fans, explaining that it would be disrespectful to point out things of the gods with the finger."

One of the first ancestors of the fan was the leaf, she declared. Every warm country has a leaf that can be used as a fan and it was from these leaves that the early fans in the various countries were modelled. The first fans had three uses—as a shade (from this has the umbrella or parasol descended), as a cooling devise, and as a fly swat.

About 750, a delegation from Chosen visited the Emperor, Miss Wells said, and the Emperor, wanting to give them a suitable farewell gift, presented them with sacks of gold and ten leaf fans—the fan even then was considered good enough for an Imperial gift. It was used even at that time as an ambassador of good will.

Japan had no leaf so she had to invent some kind of artificial leaf fan. The first attempts at this was made by pasting paper on bamboo sticks and then dyeing and preserving with persimmon juice, Miss Wells continued and displayed an ancient fan of this type.

Later, she said, the fan makers discovered that a piece of dried bamboo could be split into many little reeds which would spread out from a base and provide a frame work on which the paper could be pasted.

About 140 years ago, she related, Premier Matsudaira decided to institute a thrift program. As one of the points in his program, he declared the fan should be made inexpensive and accessable to all. He instituted what later was known as kitchen fans.

These fans, dedicated to the god of poverty, became popular and peddlars with great stacks of fans, went about the streets barking their wares. Of such a peddlar, a poet wrote: "A load of wind upon his back, but oh how hot he is—the fan peddler."

"Another ancestor of the fans," Miss Wells said, "was the feather. The Emperor of China, at an ancient time, used a feather fan to brush the dust from the wheels of his chario and in this action we see a relation between the fan and the whisk broom.

"When the feather fan came to Japan, the Japanese did not know what to do with it so they put it in the shrine, where its descendants can be seen today."

Miss Weels showed another ancestor of the fan that looked somewhat like a duster. Sometimes made of hair and sometimes of wool, it was used to drive insects away from sacrificial offerings and so it came, in time, to be the emblem of purity.

"Another ancestor," Miss Wells continued, "was the mask. In China, the ladies of the court wore masks. One day, being warm, the daughter of a mandarin who was attending a party, took off her mask to fan her face. The Chinese fans can be told even to this day by their resemblence to a mask—a long stick runs through the center of the face, where the nose line was on the old masks.

"We think we invented the electric fan but in 300 B.C., there was in use in China, a fan that revolved so as to change the air in the house. It was a complicated piece of machinery, worked by man power, but it was the forerunner of our electric fans."

Miss Wells said that when the Chinese fans came to Japan, the Japanese made them of iron to be used both as a weapon or a shield. She related how the sceptor also was an ancestor of the fan and she traced its development in Japan. Her lecture was illustrated throughout by historic fans of the various periods, including the fan of the court lady, the fan of the dancer, and even the fan of the business man who used it as a commercial sign.

How she found the latter and how she induced the Tokyo merchant to sell it to her and her pleasure when she discovered the date, showing it was made 105 years ago, formed one of the many interesting incidents of the lecture.

Mrs. J. D. Hitch, Jr., president of the club, presided and Mrs. Herbert Bowles introduced Miss Wells.

of the Constitution has seemed to most people only a very small item. That is the reason for so much indifference. It is only the professional politicians who have been excited.

Faith in Parliament Wanes

As a whole the country has so lost faith in Parliament, which has come to be regarded solely as a tax-imposing machine, that the people see little prospect of really effective reform coming that way. There is certainly no enthusiastic hope that M. Doumergue as a "Premier with power", will be any more effective than his more transient predecessors.

Still it is felt it is a step in the right direction. It is one small contribution to bracing up that that the country feels it badly needs. Another move receiving support is Louise Weiss's new campaign for woman suffrage.

Anti-Lynching Law Demanded In United States

Recent Cases Of Violence Spur Movement For Federal Statute

The recent Florida lynching has brought a renewed demand for national legislation to check an evil against which the States frequently seem incapable of acting. The entire problem is so bound up with local psychology and politics that action against lynchers is seldom taken, and for this reason there has been growing for years a feeling that only Federal authority can meet the situation, says Russell Owen in the New York Times.

Congress has been reluctant to act through fear of violating States' rights, and also because the problem raises other constitutional questions. But the great opposition to a national anti-lynching law has come from the Southern States, where the greatest number of lynchings occur. After the Dyer Act was passed by the House it was defeated in the Senate by the House it was defeated in the Senate by filibustering tactics of Southern Senators.

Now, however, the situation has become such that the Wagner-Costigan Bill, which is an improvement on the Dyer Bill, will be brought up again for discussion, and there seems a fair chance that Southern opposition will be beaten. The reason is that not only have lynchings been increasing in the last few years, but there have been some spectacular lynchings of white men.

Two Methods Proposed

There are two methods proposed to prevent the summary execution of a suspect by a mob. One, embodied in the Wagner-Costigan Bill, has been made law by a few States. Under it every county in which a lynching takes place shall be liable in a sum ranging from $2,000 to $10,000 for the life of the victim. That such a monetary punishment should be effective in instances where a great moral revulsion is given as the cause for lynching is a cynical commentary on life, but it is so. Since the South Carolina law was enacted in 1896 the minimum penalty of $2,000 against the county has been assessed and collected several times, and it is said that no lynching has subsequently occurred in any county fined.

The other method is also provided in the Wagner-Costigan Bill. Under this provision, any county officer who conspires with the mob to turn over the victim for lynching—and such occurrences are not infrequent—shall be criminally liable.

The question of lynching when it is subjected even to the most superficial study becomes one of surpassing interest because of the false values involved. It has always been contended, for instance, that lynching was a method of protecting the honor of white womanhood against Negroes. But in the studies which have been made it has been established that the lynchings on a charge of rape are only from 5 to 6 per cent of the whole; and, of course, guilt is not proved.

The number of lynchings in the United States can never be definitely known, because records have been kept only since 1889. The record has been fairly complete since 1889, however, and it shows that between that time and the present there have been 3,731 lynchings.

Lynchings in Five Years

There have been years when lynching seemed to be on the decline; in 1932, for instance, the number of cases sank to an all-time low of ten; only to increase in 1933 to twenty-eight. The following table gives the number of lynchings (ninety-four) for the five-year period 1930-34:

Alabama	12
Arkansas	1
California	2
Florida	8
Georgia	14
Indiana	2
Kansas	1
Kentucky	2
Louisiana	8
Maryland	2
Mississippi	14
Missouri	2
North Carolina	2
North Dakota	1
Ohio	1
Oklahoma	1
South Carolina	6
Tennessee	5
Texas	8
West Virginia	2

As to the guilt or innocence of mob-law victims accused of various crimes. It was testified before a Senate committee this year in a hearing on the Wagner-Costilgan Bill, as the result of a survey made by the Southern Commission for the Study of Lynching, of which Dr. George F. Milton, editor of The Chattanooga News, was chairman, that "two of the 1930 mob victims (there were twenty-five lynchings in that year) were innocent of crime (they were not even accused), and there is grave doubt of the guilt of eleven others. In six of these eleven cases there is considerable doubt as to just what crimes, if any, were committed, and in the other five, in which there is no question as to the crimes committed, there is considerable doubt as to whether the mobs got the guilty men."

Many arguments have been raised against the Federal anti-lynching bill. One is that it is unconstitutional, but the method of imposing fines upon counties for the failure of law officers to uphold the law because of negligence or conspriracy has been sustained in the State courts in more than one instance. To many observers it seems probable that the proposed Federal act is constitutional, although there are some who would like to see its provisions rewritten.

Another protest is based on the assertion that although lynching is wrong it takes the place of dilatory justice. In answer to this it was testified before the Senate committee that the persons lynched are usually friendless, poor and without any legal or political influence. It was stated that it could not be maintained that justice was not swift in the South in punishing a Negro; certainly it was quicker than it would be in punishing a white man for a similar crime.

World Is Invited To Peru's 400th Anniversary Fete

Lima, City Of Kings, Preparing Fine Hospital For All During Observance

Lima, the capital of Peru, invites the world to come and visit. Four hundred years old on Jan. 18, 1935, the city will celebrate its founding by the Spanish explorer, Francisco Pizarro, says the Christian Science Monitor.

The prestige of age, modern smartness, prosperity, and of once having been the center of Spain's authority in the Western Hemisphere, belongs to this city near the Pacific coast.

Municipal officials are asking people far and wide to come and see Lima's old and modern buildings, its Indian textiles, galleries of paintings and drawing by national artists, the University of San Marcos, the most ancient in the Americas, and lastly, but not least, its nearly 400,000 contented citizens.

For more than two centuries the Peruvian capital and its viceroys ruled the Isthmus of Panama and all the Spanish territory, except Venezuela, in South America. Today, less influential, the city still carries on—a symbol of Spain's erstwhile supremacy in the New World: a supremacy replaced by friendly rather than aggressive interests toward the other inter-American nations.

Reads like a Romance

The history of the former Incan settlement reads like a tale from a story book. Four hundred years ago Pizarro, a conquistador in search of wealth, dispatched messengers, from the mountainous exterior where he rested, to locate a site near the sea where a city might be founded. The messengers came upon an Indian village on the banks of the Rimac River. On Jan. 18, 1535 the "city of the Kings" was started, so named in honor of the Spanish monarchs.

Gradually the place expanded, acquiring beauty and fame. Through its streets passed gold and silver and commerce headed for the Old World. Palaces were built, great rooms opening onto wide patios were filled with costly furniture, and carved wooden balconies sequestered young girls from the ardent gaze of gay, wooing caballeros. From the Plaza Mayor extended broad streets with their many activities. Above them rose the first cathedral planned by Pizarro, and along them were built the palace for the Spanish conqueror and buildings with offices for the lesser officials.

Past and present now walk side by side. Under carved balconies go asphalt streets with electric lamps instead of rough hewn roads and torches for the wayfarers of the night. From the Plaza stretch wide avenues extending to suburbs of modern homes and gardens. Roses bougainvillaea vines, geraniums and jasmine climb walls and fences, covering them with riotous colors.

Not all the thousands of visitors expected in Lima during the coming January may stay in the modern, comfortable hotels that look out upon busy squares or upon quaint streets flanked by buildings overhanging the sidewalks. But other quarters will be ready, neat and hospitable, although visitors will spend little time indoors. The days and evenings with their ever changing scenes will not permit.

The Giant That Hath Warred With Heaven

The "Old Man of Hoy" is the tallest of all rock pillars or "stacks" created as a result of the sea's erosion of the shore cliffs of England. It is a pinnacle 450 feet high and stands in rugged majesty upon the Island of Hoy in the Orkneys. It is very old. Tradition affirms that many generations back the Old Man stood on two legs, one of which has since yielded to the attacks of the sea. It is believed that "the giant has warred with Heaven" and that "His ruined scalp has been thunder-driven" in the affray.

The Dowry Of Queen Margaret

When Margaret the daughter of Christian I of Denmark married James III of Scotland in July 1469, the Danish King promised her a dowry of 60,000 Rhensh Florins in cash (about $29,000), ten thousand florins payable immediately and the balance on the installment plan. As the King was only able to raise 2000 florins immediately, he had to pledge the Orkney and Shetland Islands as security for the Sum. The dowry was never paid and as a result the Islands became the property of Scotland.

There has been a stern taboo in the Foreign Office against all foreign service officials marrying foreign women. The taboo dates back to 1887 when it was laid down by the late Shuzo Aoki, then Foreign Minister.

The young diplomat was caught by the old unwritten law when he returned several months ago with his foreign wife on leave. He was ordered by the Foreign Office to dissolve the marriage or leave the foreign service.

Pirandello Wins Nobel Prize By Work In General

Author Long Interested In What He Terms Man's Need To Deceive Himself

The award of the Nobel Prize of $41,318 to Luigi Pirandello was based on the author's general contribution to literature, there being no mention of any particular work according to a Stockholm dispatch of the New York Times.

Author Expresses Pleasure

The little white beard of Luigi Pirandello bobbed in lively fashion in Rome as he chuckled over his success in winning the Nobel prize in literature.

Italy's premier playwright, now that Gabriel d'Annunzio's sun is setting, received an interviewer in the library of his small apartment in a suburb. He read with great interest a telegram from Stockholm announcing the award. Smiling broadly, he said:

"Of course, I'm going to keep it. There are poor authors, too

"Certainly Im going to keep on working. I have dozens of ideas just crying to be put on paper."

Signor Pirandello said one of the greatest disappointments he has had in recent years was in connection with the United States. He had a contract with the Shubert Theater Corporation, which failed. Consequently he has not sent to America the play "Giants of the Mountain," which was especially written to be produced in the United States because of the grandiose stage setting required.

"In order to find out something about the situation," he related, "I wrote to a New York lawyer, but he replied that merely to study the situation he wanted $500. At this rate the only one who would have realize a profit would have been the lawyer."

He said he now was putting his latest comedy, "One Doesn't Know How," on the Italian stage.

He is greatly interested in the project of the Italian Government to create a State theater.

Asked when he intended to visit America next, he replied, "I'm waiting for better times."

Chooses Metaphysical Themes

Throughout his literary career Luigi Pirandello has been juggling with the philosophical problem of reality. In his plays, short stories, essays, poems and novels the question "What is reality?" is an ever-recurring theme.

Signor Pirandello's predilection for metaphysics is probably bound up with his early education. He was born on June 28, 1867, on a country estate near Girgenti, Sicily. He first went to Rome at the age of 19. In 1891 he entered the University of Bonn in Germany and there came into contact with professors of philosophy. At Bonn he received his doctorate in philosophy. Ever since that time he has been influenced by the impressions he received during his student days in Germany.

His first volume, in verse, was published in 1889. Luigi Capuana, a Sicilian contemporary of Signor Pirandello, persuaded him to try his pen at fiction, and in 1894 he published his first novel, "L'Esclusa" (The Outcast). From that time on novels and short stories flowed from his pen. One of his best-known novels, "The Late Mattia Pascal," appeared in 1904.

Wrote His Play at 45

It was not until he was 45 years old that he turned to the theater. In his plays he gave vigorous expression to the despairing outlook on life that had characterized his novels and short stories.

Despite their concentration on metaphysical problems, Signor Pirandello's plays are frequently sprinkled with brilliant wit. His comedies and other dramas reveal his ability to vitalize philosophical questions through the medium of characters who are intensely alive. Their conversation is always marked by sensibiliy and wit. His play "Tonight We Improvise" is a half-humorous, half-serious attempt to set forth in dramatic terms the answer to the riddle of reality.

Signor Pirandello's plays have been successful both in Italy and in many foreign countries. They have been translated into fifteen languages.

In 1925 he opened in Rome a theater where his own and new foreign plays are produced.

Signor Pirandello's plays include "Henry IV," "Right You Are," "Six Characters in Search of an Author," "Each in His Own Way," "The Pleasure of Honesty," "Naked," "As You Desire Me," "Tonight We Improvise" and a volume of one-act plays. His novels include "The Old and the Young," "Shoot," "The Outcast," None and a Hundred Thousand" and "The Late Dattia Pascal." He has also brought out two wellknown volumes of short stories, "The Naked Truth" and "Horse in the Moon."

In January of this year an Italian opera, "Legend by Francesco Malipiero, to which Signor Pirandello contributed the libretto, received its world premiere in Brunswick, Germany. When it was produced in Rome three months later, in the presence of Premier Mussolini, critics recieved it coolly, caling it "half a disaster."

Mrs. Roosevelt Honored For Outstanding Work

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 5—Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt yesterday was announced as the Gimbel Award's selection for "the outstanding woman of the nation in 1934."

Presentation of the award, a medal and $1000, will be made at a testimonial dinner to Mrs. Roosevelt in Philadelphia on Deec. 12. German Club In Vienna Reopens

Austrian Government Allows Center Of Nazi Intrigue To Resume Activities

The fruits of the Austrian government's negotiations with friends of the Nazis were beginning to be apparent on November 6, according to the New York Times correspondent of Vienna. That day the German Club, the center of all the more discreet Nazi scheming, which was closed by the police in July 25, the day of the Nazi putsch, was reopened by order of the government. The club's president is General Bardolff, who with Dr. Rainthaler has been the principal negotiator with the government on behalf of the Nazi sympathizers.

There are growing complaints among the Jewish community of Vienna of an unobtrusive but steady increase of anti-Semitism in government circles. It has been shown especially in measures taken week by week under the new commissary mayor of Vienna, Dr. Schmitz, to get rid of Jewish doctors and others in the municipal employ.

Parallel with the opening of the Nazi negotiations came the news that the Heimwehr had declared war on Dr. Ernst Karl Winter, the clerical and monarchist but somewhat democratic deputy mayor of Vienna appointed by the late Chancellor Dollfuss with the mission of trying to win over the workers from socialism.

Heimwehr to Bar Meetings

An order has now been issued from the headquarters of the Lower Austrian Heimwehr that Dr. Winter's "reconciliation meetings" are to be prevented "by the threat of forcible dispersal."

"All the Heimwehr comrades must concentrate on effecting the disappearance of Dr. Winter from public life at the earliest possible moment," run the signed instructions. "This order is to be carried out with the utmost severity."

Baron von Wiesner, head of the Austrian legitimists, will publish in the next issue of the official legitimist organ an article containing allegations that Colonel Franz von Papen, the German Minister, is trying to organize a legitimist putsch to discredit the legitimists generally.

Colonel von Papen is developing marked activity among the German colonies in the parts of Austria most effected by the recent Nazi putsch. In Carinthia he spoke yesterday to the members of the German Club in Klagenfurt. On his way back to Vienna today he stopped at Graz and delivered another address to German residents at the local German Club.

He told them that the new Reich founded on Jan. 20, 1933, embraced all its sons at home and abroad. Germany, he declared, was cleansing itself of all kinds of foreign influences.

Winning Of Saar Is Foremost On Minds Of Nazis

Plebiscite Victory Is Held Essential To Build Up Hitler's Prestige

What a danger spot in Europe the Saar region forms was clearly shown this week by the agitation in Germany over the French announcement that troops were held in readiness to be sent into the Saar if the governing commission should ask for assistance in maintaining order, says a Berlin despatch dated Nov. 10, to the New York Herald Tribune.

The article, by John Elliot Continues:

This simple statement led to a violent campaign of incitement in the German press, in which comparisons were made with Raymond Poincare's invasion of the Ruhr in 1923. But the German press has long since lost all sense of proportion when it comes to the Saar question.

For instance, the argument advanced, in Nazi newspapers that the French announcement amounted to putting the Saar voters under duress, is simply nonsense to anybody who examines this question coolly.

Troops Really Protect Voters

If the Nazis abstain from undertaking a putsch, their supporters in the Saar have nothing to fear. In that case there will be no entry of the French into the Saar. On the contrary, the French declaration of readiness to meet all emergencies is welcome assurance to opponents of the Nazi government in the Saar that they can exercise their right of suffrage without hindrance.

The documents submitted by Geoffrey Knox, League of Nations High Commissioner in the Saar, to the Geneva organization, with their revelation of how the Nazis have been drilling Saar youth in the Reich show that the fears of a Nazi putsch in the disputed area are far from lacking foundation. The Nazi uprising in Vienna, too, proves that rumors of a pending Nazi putsch in the Saar cannot be lightly dismissed.

French Seen Aiding Peace

In fact, it can be argued that the French are rendering a real international service in giving timely notice of the mobilization of their troops on the Saar frontier. If Premier Benito Mussolini had announced in June that he had concentrated his military forces on the Brenner Pass to pounce down on Innsbruck in the event of a Nazi putsch in Vienna, it is highly possible that Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss would still be living.

The angry and passionate feelings expressed in the Nazi press these days reflect only too clearly the nervousness with which the Hitlerites view the plebiscite in the Saar January 13. While it is virtually certain that a majority of the Saar population will vote for a return to Germany, it is almost equally certain this referendum will be a moral defeat for Hitler.

Will Contradict German Poll

The votes cast against reunion with Nazi Germany will be far greater than the poll for a return to Germany of the Weimar Republic would have been, and so will advertise to the outside world the worthlessness of the referendum held in the Reich last August as a guide to the state of feeling in this country in regard to the Nazi regime.

The Saar question at present absorbs the attention of the Hitler government to the exclusion of almost everything else. All other issues are subordinated to the task of regaining the Saar for Germany. This has become a question of prestige for the Nazi regime, which badly needs a diplomatic victory.

For the Saar, Berlin has consented to place the question of the Polish Corridor and revision of the Silesian frontiers in abeyance for ten years, and has signed a peace pact with Poland.

For the Saar, the Nazi government has backed down on Austria and through former Chancellor Franz von Papen is extending the olive branch to the Heimwehr government.

For the Saar, Reichsbank President Hjalmar Schacht had to make far-reaching concessions to the British in the Anglo-American debt agreement so that the Nazi government may have British good will when the thorny Saar problems come before the League Council after the plebiscite.

For the sake of the Saar, Hitler withdrew his support from his old friend, Primate Ludwig Mueller, and proclaimed his neutrality in the Protestant church conflict with hopes of allayin fears of a preponderantly Catholic vote in the Saar.

And finally, for the sake of the Saar, Joseph Buerckel, Hitler's plenipotentiary for the Saar, has issued an order to the Storm Troopers forbidding the wearing of any uniforms between January 10 and February 10 next, within a twenty-five-mile zone along the Saar frontier.

The Bloodiest Clan Fight

On July 15, 1544, near Kinlochlochy was fought the Battle of Blar-na-Leine, the most famous in Highland History. The McDonald-Clanranalds, numbering about 600 men led by John Moydartach, ambushed the Frasers led by Ranald Gallda, who was accused of having usurped John's estates. The battle lasted several hours, both sides fighting with grim determination. The McDonalds won in the end although they too were practically exterminated. Only 4 Frasers survived the battle, while the number of the McDonald survivors was 5. John Moydartach replaced Ranald as the owner of the McDonald estates. The Fraser Clan was saved from extinction by the wives who subsequently all gave birth to boys.

Shokei Jo Gakko celebrated its 42nd anniversary with a musical program which featured Mrs. Takeko Obara, soprano, of Tokyo who is a graduate of the school.

Another 42nd anniversary was celebrated recently when Miyagi Jo Gakko Literary Society gave a musical program. The play, "Quality Street" was presented.

The annual American Community party was held Thanksgiving day at the home of the Misses Cuddeback and Newberry in the Shokei compound. The Rev. Mr. Raymond Luthy was the devotional leader. A pantomine was given of the "Courtship of Miles Standish" with Miss Georgia Newberry as the reader, Mr. Robert Gerhard in the title role, and Miss Mary Hoff and Mr. Donald Zoll as Priscilla and John Alden respectively.

A new club known as the Friendship League has been originated at Sendai. At its first meeting in the student hall of the Episcopal Student Center, Mr. K. Yomazaki was elected president, Miss Margaret Garman and Mr. Donald Zoll as the foreign members of the executive committee.

Mrs. Robert Gerhard had a prominent role in the musical program given at the Tohoku Gakuin Saturday evening. Mr. K. Kuronuma conducted the combined choruses of Shokei and Miyagi Girls Schools, the Tohoku Gakuin choir, chorus and orchestra in Handel's "Hallelujah."

The Rev. Mr. Frank Moss Jr., Tokyo, was a guest during the Thanksgiving holiday of the Bishop and Mrs. Norman S. Binsted. Sunday he was the guest speaker at the confirmation service at the Sendai Episcopal church.

Following a vacation in Sendai, Bishop and Mrs. Norman S. Binsted left for Tokyo where he resumed his duties as temporary director of St. Luke's Medical Center. They will return to Sendai for the Christmas holidays.

Mexican Govt. Does Not Fear Student Strife

Believes Undergraduates Were Instruments Of Others In Recent Riots

Mexico has never been confronted, nor is she now confronted with a conflict between the Government and the student body. The objectives of our past, present and future struggles have never been and cannot logically be opposed now to any juvenile impulse, even if at times some youthful elements are deceived and turned into instruments of interests of several sorts, says Dr. Ping Casaurane, Secretary of Foreign Affairs of Mexico.

Travelling firmly on the road of modification of the social and economic structure of Mexico, with the purpose of destroying oppressive privileges of all kinds and of succeeding sometime in our efforts to improve the conditions of the great collectivities, we could not aim the forces of the Revolution at minor, secondary or incidental objectives. We travel, as we may, along a path of political and governmental action in which the interests of "the more" will subdue the interests of "the less." We travel, as we may, towards the control of displaced actions which evolve into illegitimate and retardatory influences in the spiritual realm and into excessive inflation of profits in the economic field.

Life-Problems

We have our attention fixed on life-problems affecting millions of human beings, traduced into insufficient nourishment, unclothed bodies and enslaved minds; human problems most of them and of technical order, others; problems of scientific, or as approximately as possible to scientific management of agricultural and industrial production; of better distribution of lands; of commonland credit; of real efficiency to lower costs we aim at just relationships between laborers and employers; of exact appraisal of premises in the matter of profits, for the fixation of taxes; of better and more equitable distribution of profits with the view of deriving the undue "plus valia" not only, as it happens today, to enrich capitalists, but towards insurance funds in case of suspension of work, towards payment of labor and study, towards remedying effectively the painful characteristics of insufficiency and eventuality of present-day salaries, characteristics which frequently frustrate through a rise in prices the improvement of salaries which has been attained after long and weary struggles.

Grave problems of credit control, of monetary exchange, of foreign trade, of long distance transportation, of general provisions, of storage and deposits, and many other more concrete problems which all affect the working classes and the consuming public in general: these are the real preoccupations of this and, I dare assure, of the next Revolutionary Government.

Sterile Conflict

Logically, neither then, nor now in the midst of full reconstructive activities of such great importance, in the economic and social sphere, could we have wanted,—even if we should not be granted but only one political sense and vision—to lose our time and so slightly dent our weapons in a sterile students conflict, at the almost certain eve of a legitimate acceleration of our leftist movement in such social and economic fields. Not that the present Government would not have wanted to accelerate this rythm, but an ever growing sense of responsibility conduces to such an acceleration only when convenient. Recent experiences and frank and nobly generous attitudes of sympathy of the President of the Republic for such groups, attitudes which reflected the feeling of the Revolution, prove only that we are well aware of the fact that in this kind of conflict the truth is fatally obscured or distorted to such an extent that it is frequently impossible to elucidate the real circumstances of origin or intention, even days and weeks after the event.

Demarkation Imperative

Therefore is has been imperative to proceed to the demarkation of factions. Therefore, several Government departments and organs, and I, with them, see the necessity of making a slight dissection amongst the confused elements concurring in the aspect in question, which could have been showy and boisterous, but which is not the origin of the situation. Neither will we permit it to give character or orientation to the fundamental conflict which does exist.

The struggle against the great interests inimical to the Revolution, be they the Clergy or oppressing, disorderly or absorbent capitalists, does exist. The enemy's quarters mistook moments of less accelerated rythm, imposed by political necessities or by tactical demands for the consolidation of the achieved and for the preparation of what was to come, for claudication or retrocession. And when all or some of these interests have felt that the strife continues and will continue if they want it, and that we, better prepared in matters tactical and technical, proceed firmly in our original idea, which does not search preferentially political aspects, but the improvement of the great collective masses,—which is precisely what justifies and saves our Revolution,—they prepare themselves, not any more for the defence, but for the attack. They go about it with ability, of course, and as palpable proof of their cunning, abetted perhaps by our prolonged silence in almost all sectors in order to better prepare ourselves for action, we face that perversion of and detraction from the original and primordial aspect of the struggle in the appearances of a student-conflict.

Fortunately, the fields are now well defined. If this first act is followed by others, it will not be easy to ascribe to them, neither the pretext nor the nature of student-conflicts. We will know how to force our adversaries, so that they will not shield themselves behind something as comforting and respectable as student-youths.

Concrete Expression

Why then must we involve in the concrete expression of our constitutional forms a matter pertaining to tuition? Fundamentally because we must be sincere. If we are to follow, as I believe and hope we will, the direction of "socialistic preparation" in the economic field, we had to invest our Constitution with something that would point, at least in a general way, at this anti-individualistic thought of socializing tendency, aimed at the control of misplaced elements which damage the collectivity; a political tendency and action which without thinking of seeing it or wanting to see it evolve into grotesque imitations of Governments exotic to our particular reality and our very special convenience as a counter. It will give to the State definite elements of success in its traditional campaign for the physical, economic and spiritual liberation of the worker and for the general improvement of the great collectivities of Mexico.

US Bureau Sees Increased Grain Prices For 1935

Crop Will Be Larger, Too, Thus Raising Farmers' Purchasing Power

The Department of Agriculture's 200-odd page 1934-35 forecast, out on November 5, giving its annual peep into the future on the farm situation, warns housewives to expect higher prices—higher prices, at least, till next year's crop comes in. Mr. Roosevelt has already given the same warning. Prices are going up!

Farm prices are likely to rise not because of any recondite gold theory sponsored by a Professor Warren, but by the blunt fact of crop scarcity induced by man and drought, says the Washington correspondent of the New York Times. Summing it up, the survey predicts domestic demand will be higher in 1935; foreign demand will be lower and the level of farm prices will rise, at least during the first half of the year; after that increased farm supplies may send it down again.

And here is the final factor in reply to the query, what comes after the elections? The farm problem opens a new phase. For now prices are rising and the farmer has the temptation which he did not previously have to break away from New Deal crop reduction control and to plant crops for all he is worth. Can he resist this temptation—this ancient tug of the soil? Alreay emphatic reports from eastern cotton producing states tell of furious farm dissatisfaction with the Bankhead Act. Forecasts of repeal are heard. It is just one more Administration program.

Farm Buying Power Up

The main points in the annual report of the Bureau of Agricultural Economies were:

1. Greatly reduced supplies of most farm products will be seen, which, with improvement in consumer purchasing power, will probably bring a higher level of farm income during the first half of 1934. This despite low foreign demand for American farm products.

2. Farm production will be larger than this year's unusually small production.

3. This year's higher prices may tend to stimulate excessive planting of some crops not under production control next year.

4. Continued improvement in demand late next year will depend primarily on recovery in the durable goods industries.

5. "A small improvement in the purchasing power of farm families may, in general, be expected."

6. Prices of goods used in farm production are expected to average somewhat higher, at least until June 1935.

7. The farm credit situation "will continue to show gradual improvement above the bad conditions of the past several years."

8. Next year's wheat crop is expected to result in an export surplus with prices hanging close to an export basis.

9. Substantial advances in prices of meat animals is expected, with no material expansion in livestock numbers sighted before 1936.

10. Next year's wool clip will be the smallest in several years with prices dependent on world production.

11. "A generally favorable" outlook is seen for poultry raisers with prices remaining at seasonally high levels until next summer.

12. An unfavorable outlook is sighted for dairymen because of the shortage of hay and grain.

Smaller Cotton Crop

The bureau predicted some further improvement in the total cash income of farm families available for living expenses, although less than that from 1933 to 1934.

"Although some further rise in the level of food prices may be looked for during the coming year, the prices of other goods purchased for family living will probably continue at about their present levels," the report said. "A small improvement, therefore, in the purchasing power of farm families may, in general, be expected."

A reducation of almost 3,000,000 bales in the total supply of all cotton for the 1934-35 season, despite a sharp increase in the foreign supply, was predicted by the bureau.

Placing the probable total supply at 38,200,000 bales, against slightly more than 42,100,000 in the previous season, and a 10-year average of around 35,700,000, it noted a decline of about 4,500,000 bales in the American supply, but figured the foreign supply at about 1,600,000 bales larger than for the 1933-34 season, 1,000,000 of that amount being accounted for in the carryover.

The new foreign crop was estimated at 13,600,000 bales, 600,000 more than the record yield of 1933-34. The heaviest prospective increases were noted in China, India and North Brazil, with decreases in Russia and Egypt.

Social and Personal Notes

Mrs. Annie Shepley Omori

Mrs. Annie Shepley Omori, beloved Tokyo leader, is celebrating her 80th birthday today.

"Celebrating" may not be quite the right word for the countless friends of Mrs. Omori know that her pleasures are not those derived from efforts in behalf of herself but are those which come from making others happy.

But on her birthday today, Mrs. Omori found affairs somewhat taken out of her hands. Many of those whose lives have been brightened by her activities, dropped into the Yu Rin En, or House of Friendly Neighbors, the social settlement which she heads, to wish her "A Happy Birthday," and at noon, she was the guest of honor at an informal luncheon given by Mrs. Mary Nitobe.

Mrs. Omori and her husband, the late Dr. Hyozo Omori, were the pioneers of the playground movement in Japan. The role of pioneer came natural to Mrs. Omori. She comes of representative American pioneering stock, her Yorkshire ancestors of Norman descent having settled in America early in the 16th century. Members of her family fought in the Revolutionary War. Her father, a lawyer, went to Minnesota when she was a child, and after narrow escapes in Indian conflicts, helped write the constitution of the new state.

Mrs. Omori, educated in New England, studied portrait painting in Paris and later had studios in Paris, New York, and Boston. Of her remarkable talent in portrait painting, the pictures at the Yu Rin En speak eloquently.

At a country home in Connecticut, Mrs. Omori met her future husband, who had become interested in playground work. After their marriage, they lived in Europe and the United States before coming to Japan 26 years ago. Their first residence was in Kashiwagi in Yodobashi, not far from the present Yu Rin En center. Following the lines of his chosen work, Dr. Omori directed his efforts to bringing a system of physical culture into the public schools.

Following his death, Mrs. Omori carried out a treasured dream which they had shared jointly by founding the Yu Rin En at her home, establishing a kindergarten, clubs for boys and girls of the neighborhood, starting classes in embroidery, lace work, sewing, entertainments and games which enlivened the lives of those who gathered there. Her work grew, and new buildings were erected and additions to her activities were made. A library was added in the spring of 1933.

Though her work has never been primarily concerned with charity, assistance has always been forthcoming in case of the sick who need to be taken quickly to the hospital or in case of children who need help.

While giving unstintingly of her time and means to Yu Rin En, the first model settlement in the city, Mrs. Omori has not shelved her literary interests. Her book, "Court Ladies of Old Japan" has been most popular and is known for its fine literary style. She has a manuscript on the life of Prince Shotoku and the Nara period which should be published.

Characteristically, on her birthday today, Mrs. Omori expressed much more interest in the play, "Hay Fever," which the Tokyo Amateur Dramatic club will give December 13 and 14 than in the fact that she was having a birthday, for the proceeds of the play will be used to further the work of the Yu Rin En.

AMERICAN CLUB PARTY

The first social event of the season for the American Club will be a dinner dance on December 15. Mr. Joseph Conway, chairman of the entertainment committee, announced that the committee in charge consists of Mrs. Elmer Pennell, Mrs. Gibson, Mrs. Blake and Mr. Kendell.

FRENCH CONCERT

Under the patronage of the French Ambassador and Mrs. Fernand Pila, an evening of French music will be given at the Nihon Seinenkan at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday. The artists participating will be Madame Juillot de la Morandiere, Mr. Robert Pollak, and Mr. Leo Sirota.

PLAN MEMORIAL

It will be erected by the Osaka Prefectural Office and the Osaka Municipal Office which have a construction budget for the memorial amounting to ¥10,000 at the present time.

ART EXHIBITION

Miss Elizabeth Keith has announced a change in the dates of the exhibition of her color prints. They will be shown from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. Thursday, December 13 at the Imperial hotel and at the Pan Pacific luncheon at the Imperial hotel Friday noon, December 14. The dates of her Yokohama exhibition at the New Grand hotel remain the same, Tuesday and Wednesday, December 18 and 19.

MAIL BOAT ARRIVAL

The Canadian Pacific's steamer Empress of Russia, which sailed from Vancouver last Saturday, will arrive in Yokohama Thursday, Dec. 13th.

H.M. the Emperor granted an audience Thursday morning to the Ambassador to Germany, Mr. Matsuzo Nagai; the former Ambassador to Brazil, Mr. Kyujiro Hayashi; the Minister to Portugal, Mr. Akio Kasama; and the newly appointed Ambassador to Brazil, Mr. Setsuzo Sawada.

PUPILS' DANCE RECITAL

Miss Eleana Pavlowa, the Russian dancer and teacher, will present her pupils in a dance recital at 6:30 p.m. Saturday at the Sanshi Kaikan. She will assist in the program in which 35 of her pupils will participate. A ballet, "Woodland Fantasy," with two elaborate scenes, will open the program and nine solo and group dances will follow. In the second part of the recital, Miss Pavlowa will give a dance interpretation of Chopin's Etude, Opus 10, No. 12, following which three ballets will be danced. "The Ballet in White," which will conclude the program, will be danced by Miss Pavlowa assisted by Josef and Maurice Pilares and a group of students. Takashi Yokota will be the accompanist, Tatsip Saito, master of ceremonies; Miyoji Tanaka, stage manager; and Shuka Fukazawa, assistant to Miss Pavlowa.

EMBASSY LUNCHEON

The American Ambassador and Mrs. Joseph Clark Grew entertained at luncheon Thursday. Their guests were the Canadian Minister and Mrs. Marler, Bishop and Mrs. N. S. Binsted, Mr. and Mrs. Clark Minor, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Bowles, Mrs. Hugh Byas, Mrs. Howard Moss, Miss Peggy Boulton, the American Commercial Attache, Mr. Frank Williams, and the American Secretary, Mr. Morris Hughes.

Old Hindu Rope Trick Is Done By American

Robert Heger Says He Will Ask For $25,000 London Prize

An American magician at St. Paule, Minn., claimed on Nov. 1 to have successfully mastered the most baffling bit of magic of old India—the Hindu rope trick.

Robert Heger, St. Paul magician, performed the trick before the wondering eyes of an uninitiated group here and thereupon announced plans to duplicate his feat for the Magic Circle Society of Magicians in London and collect a $25,000 prize, says the New York Herald Tribune.

Bright lights of St. Paul Auditorium slowly dimmed into an after-twilight haze as the trick began. Two swarthy Hindu glided from behind darkened curtains. Behind them trod a Hindu lad attired in breech cloth. Sand spread on the stage glowed strangely in the unnatural light. Glaring floodlights suddenly poured down. A soft scent of incense floated against an indian background. On the sand lay a huge rope, coiled like a cobra.

Moham Rajah, a true worshipper of Mohamet, stepped forward and muttered a sentence, manipulating his arms in rhythm. One end of the rope wavered, then rose into the air.

At a height of four feet, Moham Rajah commanded it to halt. Herger inserted the rope through a pine boord to prove it was not being lifted by an invisible cord.

Heger breathed out a command. The rope resumed its ascent, going up behind the jungle-painted drops. Another command and it stiffened into steel-like rigidity. Like a monkey scampering up a cocoanut tree, the Hindu lad climbed upward, hand over hand. At a height of fifteen feet—still several feet from the lowest drop—he melted from sight.

The second Hindu, turbaned and with a gleaming Indian saber, placed the knife between his teeth and scaled the rope. It gave slightly under his weight. He passed the place where the boy had disappeared and ascended more rapily. As he disappeared he struck savagely. The Hindu boy screamed as if in terror. A leg thudded into the sand. Another leg spiralled downward, then an arm, another arm, the dismembered torso and finally the head.

Ah Bahdor came forward. He removed the outer robe of his full fakir garments. He stooped, picked up the dismembered pieces and folded them into the robe.

Veteran Leaders Serve Australia In Lyons Cabinet

Prime Minister Plans London Trip For King's Anniversary

Several personalities well known overseas are included in the second Cabinet formed by the present Prime Minister, Joseph A. Lyons, following the September general elections according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. Lyons is Prime Minister and Treasurer again. Early in 1935 he will make his first trip abroad, having accepted an invitation to attend the celebrations in London in honor of the silver jubilee of the reign of King George.

Sir George Pearce, Minister for Defense in the first Lyons Ministry, becomes Minister for External Affairs. He represented Australia at the Washington Disarmament Conference in 1922. Dr. Earle Page, formerly Treasurer in the Bruce Government, is the new Minister of Commerce.

R. G. Menzies becomes Attorney-General in succession to John G. Latham, who represented Australia at the Lausanne Reparations Conference in 1932, and led an Australian mission to Japan early in 1934. Mr. Latham has retired from politics to resume practice at the bar. Mr. Menzies is a brilliant young Melbourne lawyer. He is one of the outstanding figures in Australian public affairs and becomes a Federal Minister before entering the Federal Parliament, a very unusual circumstance in Australia.

The war-time Prime Minister, William M. Hughes, has regained office after having been a private Member of Parliament for the last 12 years. Mr. Hughes was ousted from the Prime Ministership by a Country Party intrigue in 1922. He now becomes Vice-President of the Executive Council and Minister for Health.

Sir Henry Gullett, who is the new Minister in Charge of Foreign Trade Treaties, was Minister for Customs in the Lyons Government up to 1933 when he retired. He was one of the Australian delegates to the Imperial Economic Conference at Ottawa in 1932.

The Ministry is regarded as the strongest in point of talent and debating power formed in Australia during recent years, but its position will be precarious because it has not a majority of its own in the House of Representatives and must rely upon the nonlabor Country Party for support.

Repeated negotiations for the formation of a Composite Ministry have broken down, owing mainly to personal antagonisms and to the desire of the Country Party for a share in the Ministry disproportionate to its influence and numbers in the Federal Parliament.

Joseph A. Lyons, Prime Minister and Treasurer.

Sir George Foster Pearce, External Affairs and Territories.

R. G. Menzies, Attorney-General and Industry.

William M. Hughes, Vice-President of Executive Council and Minister of Health.

Robert A. Parkhill, Defense.

Thomas Paterson, Interior.

Thomas W. White, Trade and Customs.

Alexander J. McLachlan, Postmaster-General and Minister of Development.

W. Casey, Assistant Treasurer.

British Believe Poll Heads U.S. To Dictatorship

Hold President's Victory 'By Personality' Allows Him To Do As He Wishes

Is the United States, although perhaps not definitely conscious thereof, merely reproducing the trend toward absolutism in government which has so strongly marked the last decade in Europe? asks Harold Scarborough in a London despatch to the New York Herald Tribune.

The article dated Nov. 10 continues:

Naturally, of course, British comments upon the election vary according to the political complexion of the papers in which they are expressed. Equally naturally, virtually all the London papers without differentiation see in this week's voting a continuation of that movement toward radicalism which began in 1932.

Give Credit to Roosevelt

The significant things, however, is how organs of different party affiliations emphasize their belief that Tuesday's vote was primarily an expression of confidence in President Roosevelt as a strong man, and only secondarily an approbation of the policies for which he stands. Incidentally, it might be remarked that British editorial writers seem occasionally to suffer from the same disabilities as their American colleagues, in having difficulty in discerning exactly what those policies are.

However, one finds the same refrain in almost all the comments which appeared here Thursday morning. "The Times," for instance, called the midterm elections "a great personal triumph for Roosevelt" "The Morning Post" remarked on how much the personal factor of leadership counts in popular democracy.

Held a "Vote for Leadership"

"The News Chronicle" thought the American public's decision leaves Roosevelt the most powerful man in the world, with authority more indisputable than any American President has ever possessed." "The Herald" said: "Tuesday's vote was not so much for this or that policy—it was a vote for strong and courageous leadership." "The Daily Mail" declared: "Roosevelt is a strong man, and is admired because in a tremendous crisis he took bold action and was not content to sit with folded arms." "The Evening Standard" thought: "Roosevelt owes his victory to a series of bold legislative actions."

British observers are less unanimous as to the probable result of Tuesday's mandate on the remaining years of the President's term. Some feel that he will now swing to the right in an effort to head off radicalism in Congress; others believe that he will interpret the mid-term elections as authorization to go ahead with even bolder experiments than any in which he has indulged.

Yet here again it is worthy of note that the underlying assumption in all his speculation concerns not what the President will be forced to do—or find it politic to do—but what he himself will desire to accomplish. In other words, the British public is being led to believe that, like Hitler or Mussolini, President Roosevelt now finds himself, within very broad limitations, able to do pretty much as he wishes toward shaping the course of America's ship of state.

If, in private conversation with English friends, one poins out that the President still consults the will of the people as expressed through the ballot boxes, he is likely to get the answer, "But so does Hitler."

It should be understood that, in expressing such a viewpoint, the British manifest no hostility toward the President. Indeed, in more than one editorial this week the wish was expressed that the present British government would show equal decision and boldness; while the flounderings of French democracy in search of leadership seem to the British only to emphasize America's luck in having a strong personality as President.

It is rather the acceptance here of the belief that the United States is falling into line with the rest of the world, in moving toward the authoritarian concept of government, that seems significant.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Bus of the Skies

The question whether the woodcock really carries its young has long been debated among sportsmen. Major J. W. Seigne an authority on ships and woodcock, now reports that he had definitely seen it done. The hen carried her young between her thighs, and while the flight was at first rather labored due to the weight of the charge, the pace increased very rapidly and in the end did not seem to inconvenience the bird.

Peruvian Cotton Men Discuss Japanese Trade

Rengo

LIMA Nov. 30—The allegedly serious situation of the Peruvian textile industry due to "dumping" of cheap Japanese goods on the domestic market was discussed here today at a meeting of cotton dry-goods manufacturers summoned by the national textile committee.

The meeting decided to ask the government to limit textile imports and to appoint a commission to urge the Minister of Finance to take steps for the purpose of checking unfair foreign competition. It also decided to appeal to all newspapers in Peru to start a nationalistic campaign against imported goods.

CAT AND DOG SUPERSTITIONS

Mrs. Edith de Garis spoke on "The Unrighteous Cat and the Righteous Dog in Japanese Superstitions" at a meeting of the Tokyo Branch of the League of American Penwomen at the Mampei hotel this afternoon.

Miss Florence Wells, president of the organization, was hostess and several guests attended.

"Even in western countries," Mrs. de Garis said, "the cat has been endowed with mystic powers, usually of malevolence. Cats are the companions of witches, the heralds of misfortune, and the messengers of the devil. In the zodiacal periods of the Japanese year, there is no cat. Why? Because he has a bad spirit and, especially when he is old, will turn against the house and the family.

"And as for the long-tailed cat, he will not be tolerated even as a kitten for will he not twine his long snakey tail around his neck and dance in the dark midnight?

"Therefore most Japanese cats obligingly are born with a bump for a tail or, at least, with an abbreviated appendage. Should they be so inconsiderate as to appear with a long tail they are taken to the animal doctor and the offensive appendages are summarily cut off.

"Those of you who were in Tokyo at the time the Imperial Hotel burned many years ago may recall that a man named Mr. Miliaressy, rushed into the hotel to save his pet cat, but lost his life in the attempt.

"At that time a strange story was told by a Mr. Yoshida, an old man who used to be one of the retainers in the family of Lord Abe. The Imperial Hotel was situated exactly on the site where the principal mansion of Lord Abe formerly was located.

"It seems that when Lord Abe became old and weak and suffered from paralysis he retired and stayed in bed most of the time on account of his feebleness. But one day he insisted on being taken to the bathroom for a bath. He ordered his servants to leave the room and to shut the door so that no one could see him from the outside. Though the servants hesitated at first, they obeyed. The same thing happened for several days and out of curiosity to know what the old gentleman was doing, one of his attendants peeped into the bathroom through a small hole and lo! he saw an old cat sitting on the edge of the bath tub washing himself.

"He could not believe his eyes and the next day he peeked again, and again he saw the old cat washing his face. This time he opened the door suddenly and killed the cat with his spear. When the dead cat fell to the floor it became the body of the old gentleman. Confusion followed in the house and there was more confusion when the body of the old man was laid on his bed and it turned into the body of the old cat. The servants removed the bed, mats and finally the floor boards and there they discovered the bones of the old gentleman.

"Since this incident, the ghost of the old cat appeared nightly in the room of the head retainer, asking him to build a shrine to deify his spirit as a guardian so that the house of Lord Abe would be protected forever from fire. The ghost also asked him that so long as his spirit was deified in the Abe mansion, no dog should be allowed to enter the grounds.

"It was on account of this tradition that the family of Lord Abe never permitted a dog to enter the grounds for many a generation, and it was believed that if the promise was ever broken the house would be cursed by the undying spirit of the old cat and be consumed by fire.

"It is not known how long ago this story came in to existence but it is certain that the Imperial Hotel was built on the site of the Abe mansion and that the hotel had more than one fire and that Mr. Miliaressy lost his life attempting to rescue his cat from the flames.

"When there is a corpse in the house, the Japanese are accustomed to take the house cat far away from the dead person and put a sword on the coffin. This is because of a superstition that a dead man moves when a cat is near him, or that a cat steals a corpse and eats it."

Mrs. de Garis told a legend to illustrate this belief and explained that once a Japanese scientist declared that it is not impossible that a cat could move a dead body. He based his belief on the fact that a dead object may be moved by the effect of the electricity in the cat's fur.

Speaking of dogs, Mrs. de Garis said there are few Japanese legends about wicked dogs but many stories about dogs who have assisted and protected mankind. In many cases, the dog is really a sacred animal, she said. For instance, the dog is the only animal admitted on Koyasan, the sacred mountain of the Shingon sect of Buddhism.

"In Harima there is a Buddhist temple called Inu-dera (Dog Temple) and at Iwata village in Shizuoka prefecture there is a Dog Shrine in connection with which a custom which was in existence in the 14th Century is still followed," she continued.

"It seems that in ancient days there was a festival for the vliage shrine on August 10 and on every festival eve a white arrow appeared mysteriously on the roof of one of the houses a house in which there was a young maiden. This was a sign from a mountain demon that the daughter of the house must be sacrificed to the demon, or calamity to the village would follow. The villagers always obeyed, and yearly a beautiful maiden was sacrificed.

"One year the arrow appeared on the roof of an inn. The innkeeper had only one daughter and his grief at being obliged to sacrifice her may be imagined. He confided in one of his guests, a pilgrim, who advised him to put a fierce dog in a box instead of the girl. They did this and carried the box to the shrine. At midnight the demon opened the box and the dog sprang at him and after a short fight succeeded in killing the demon though he himself died of his wounds. After this, no arrow appeared on any roof in the village. The villagers were so grateful to the dog that they built the shrine to him and the festival has been carried out in homage to him every year since that time in the 14th Century.

"The dog has been immortalized in Japanese literature by Bakin's famous novel Hakkenden, or "Story of Eight Dogs." This narrates the adventures and exploits of eight heroes of semi-canine parentage who represent the eight cardinal virtues: benevolence, righteousness, politeness, wisdom, loyalty, sincerity, filial piety and brotherly love."

Mrs. de Garis said that during the rule of the Fifth Tokugawa Shogun, who was born in a "dog year" and who believed that his own fate depended on the degree of protection he gave dogs and other animals, thousands of persons were imprisoned for killing dogs. Homeless dogs were cared for in kennels erected in Nakano, as many as 100,000 dogs being cared for in kennels which covered more than 83 acres of land. This ruler, Tsunayoshi, was nicknamed "Dog Prince."

One of the most common superstitious beliefs in Korea is that if a white hair appear on the tail of dog, it presages a misfortune to the master of the house, she told.

One of the most common toys in Japan is the papier-mache dog, which is considered the perpetual protector of little children, and when hanging above their heads, makes them stop crying, Mrs. de Garis said.

There is the story of a faithful dog whose head, cut off by his master, flew up to a snake on a branch of a tree and killed it to save his master's life. Another faithful dog, when his master was killed by an enemy took his master's head, buried it in an old tomb and watched there till he himself died of hunger; and this tomb is now famous as Inuzuka (Dog Tomb), she concluded.

Colombia Making Rapid Progress Toward Recovery

Construction Rises Five-fold —Higher Prices Aid To Agriculture

A fivefold increase in construction features Colombian recovery and a continuously rising price level has spurred business, industry and agriculture, says a Bogota, dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor.

Although the upturn started in the middle of 1933, fears of hostilities wih Peru over the Leticia corridor prevented full realization of measures initiated by the Olaya Herrera Administration. After signing of the Rio de Janeiro pact last June, however, a steady rise in prices has been evident. Agricultural products rose an average of 50 per cent, according to statistics.

Tariffs Raised

Under higher tariff duties, manufacturing has developed in the departments of Antioquia, Cundinamarca and along the Atlantic coast. Silk weaving, woolen and cotton mills have been established, as well as candy factories, preserving industries, perfumeries and toilet articles, chemicals and medicinal products, and copper and iron articles.

Average monthly capital investments in new industries has risen this year from $250,000 to $1,500,000.

The gains have had favorable reactions in commercial markets here and at Medellin where shares of commercial and mortgage banks are up 30 per cent and industrial shares as much as 50 per cent. Internal bonds rose 50 per cent.

The money market continues to improve in strength. The Superintendent of Banks reports bank deposits in the first eight months of 1934 increased from $66,454,000 to $71,000,000. Currency in circulation increased from $75,749,000 to $85,030,000. Gold reserves of the Bank of the Republic rose from $16,877,000 on Jan. 1 to $20,538,000 on Sept. 15.

Construction activity in the principal cities has added impetus to the upswing. In Bogtota, Barranquilla, Cali, and Medellin the average of new building has been five times that of last year.

Unfavorable factors include uncertainty over devaluation and balancing the budget.

A commission of experts named by President Alfonso Lopez before his inauguration has been studying currency devaluation, as well as by financiers and business men, without reaching any definite agreement as to the type of devaluation suitable for Colombian economic interests.

British Aircraft Scores In Recent Naval Operations

Demonstrates Hostile Fleet In Channel Would Suffer Heavy Onslaughts

The operations of the R.A.F. Coastal Area against the Home Fleet during the three days preceding November 3 have demonstrated the heavy risks that would be taken by any hostile naval force attempting to pass from the North Sea into the English Channel, says the aeronautical correspondent of the London Times, whose story follows.

The exercise suggests that the enemy would probably be found and attacked by aircraft before or during his passage through the straits and appears to state quite definitely that he would suffer violent onslaughts immediately after his passage.

The task set the R.A.F. by the Home Fleet was one of peculiar difficulty. The strategy employed by Air Vice-Marshal A. M. Longmore was remarkable in its thoroughness and, in theory, could only have failed if visibility in the day-time had been reduced to less than two miles. In those circumstances only a bigger or a faster reconnaissance force could have closed all the loop-holes. His purpose divided itself into three main compartments. He had to make certain each morning that the quarry had not slipped past him during the night. Then he had to make sure that by nightfall the Fleet was not close enough to the straits to make its escape during the night. Finally, when it had entered this area he had to attempt an attack to prevent its getting through unscathed in the darkness.

The system worked perfectly. Early on Thursday and Friday the Southampton flying-boats from Calshot swept the whole of the Channel eastwards to the Straits. Each morning they returned negative reports: the Straits were closed by a flying-boat patrol working to and fro across the narrow sea. Then the flying-boats from Felixtowe began to sweep the North Sea, beginning near the Straits at such a time that by dusk they were over 100 miles north of the Thames. When these five Southamptons turned on Thursday evening for Felixstowe they had sighted no enemy ships. The Air Officer Commanding was satisfied that the Fleet was still north of the farthest limit of this reconnaissance, that it therefore could not reach the Straits before dawn, and concluded that a night patrol was unnecessary.

The following day's work, carried out on the same lines, yielded a positive result and set Coastal Area an awkward problem. Two submarines were found in the morning, only 15 miles east of Aldborough. Four more were found in the early afternoon, but the Blue Force had no surface craft to worry about and could ignore the submarines. Later in the afternoon the capital ships and the aircraft-carrier were found far away to the east. Their position was given as 39 miles E.N.E. of the Maas Lightship. Twenty minutes after their discovery the Fairey III. F's of No. 822 Squadron were away from Manston to make an attack. The unit was recalled before it reached the Fleet because the full journey would have meant night landings for a squadron unpractised in night flying.

Meanwhile two of the flying-boats hung on to the Fleet until dark. At 5.30 p.m. the Southamptons lost touch, were recalled, and another Southampton, No. S 1044 took over the duty of night reconnaissance. The night was very dark. There was no moon. The Fleet presumably making slow speed to avoid leaving a wake to betray each ship. Every light was shrouded. The flying-boat, reporting visibility not in miles or yards but as "very dark," might fly low in the hope of seeing a silhouette or might rely on finding a wake. In either case its work was difficult. Once it reported a capital ship, only to cancel the report 10 minutes later. Another three-quarters of an hour and it was certain it had found its quarry.

From the coast this lonely watcher could be seen dropping parachute flares over the ships, so that he might keep them in view and guide the attacking force to them. Presently the Ripons of No. 811 Squadron took over from S 1044, dropped their own parachute flares and flame floats, and sailed in to attack dark outlines these revealed. This was the only night attack, and the Blue Force relied on being able to make heavy attacks at dawn. The flying-boat was called in at midnight. Five hours later the new day's reconnaissance had begun and offensive units had been concentrated at Gosport.

Aircraft-carrier Bombed

Soon after 6.30 a.m. the capital ships had been found, 26 miles N.E. of Barfleur with the aircraft-carrier six miles astern and Nimrods from the Courageous went up to attack the flying-boats. Almost at once the bombers were ordered away from Gosport to try to disable the aircraft-carrier. Nimrods and Ospreys of the Blue Force had been on defensive patrol since 6.15 a.m. No. 822 Squadron was also in the air awaiting instruction which, through wireless jamming presumably from the Fleet, it could not receive until it had landed again at Gosport. Within a short time so many attacks had been made on the Courageous that it was regarded as "no longer the first objective."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Strangest Accident

In the dark of the night of June 6, 1932, on the Great Lakes, the speed boat "Miss Redemption" struck the Coast Guard boat CG 8000 at a speed of more than 40 miles per hour. The speed boat entered on one side of the coast guard boat and emerged at the other. No lives were lost. It was fortunate that it struck the only spot where it could have gone through the Government vessel without killing all hands. The CG was cut in half but neither boat sank until they were safely beached. It is truly one of the most remarkable accidents to come to the attention of Believe It or Not.

seventy guests; it is more probable that there will be 100, and the cost of the breakfast can scarcely be less than £3 a head, including wine.

Finally there comes the silver money—about £50—that will be thrown to the crowds about the palace as the royal couple drive away.

There are, of course, minor items to swell the total cost. For example, telephone and telegraph charges in connection with preparations for the wedding have already taken at least £200, for Princess Marina has had to be consulted on the wire or by telephone concerning all important details.

The total cost of the wedding will certainly exceed £15,000 ($75,000). It has been semi-officially reported that King George will bear the expense. It will not be a state function in the sense that a coronation is, or the wedding of the sovereign or of the heir to the throne.

Indian Peasant Is Big Issue In Economic Plan

desire for practical education. Existing schools have increased the number of their pupils, and in some places where there was no school the villagers have subscribed to engage a schoolmaster. The schoolmaster not only imparts education, but is an important medium for disseminating information. For this it will be desirable that he should undergo a special course at the training centers. In certain villages night schools have been started, and are proving useful in checking the relapse into illiteracy which is so discouraging a feature of Indian education; libraries have been formed, and in some localities a circulating library serves the needs of a group of villages.

Medical Relief

Medical relief has been taken up, and in many centers dispensaries serve the needs of the villages surrounding them. These dispensaries are also pivots for the dissemination of information how to prevent epidemics of such common scourges as cholera and smallpox. Owing to purdah and other similar features of the Indian social system, one of the difficulties hitherto has been that of securing the wider cooperation of women. It is therefore gratifying to note that women are coming forward in increasing numbers to help in instructing wives and mothers on maternity work, the care of infants, and domestic sanitation.

The Agricultural Department has given much practical help; and marketing officers have been appointed, central seed depots started, and rings of registered growers of improved seed established. Nurseries have been laid down so that villages can have trees which will provide timber and fuel. Boy Scouts are proving very helpful in these matters, and Girl Guides are also beginning to play their part.

The program drawn up by a typical district committee is interesting. At a meeting attended by representatives of various villages it was decided to work on the following lines:—(a) improvement of inter-village communications and water supply by local labor; (b) popularizing agricultural improvements and systematic storage of farmyard manure; (c) promotion of village sanitation; (d) public health activities, quinine distribution, disinfection of wells, and the closing down of those found to be contaminated: and (e) propaganda in favor of panchayts, sanitary committees, temperance, Boy Scouts, and Better Living Societies.

Broadcasting Aid

The objects of Better Living Societies are all-round improvement, economic, material, and moral; better education, better business, cleaner living, thrift, selfhelp, and better farming are all within their sphere, the program being fixed in advance by a majority of three-fifths of the members present. One very useful function is to settle disputes without recourse to litigation; another is to curtail wasteful expenditure upon domestic and religious ceremonies. Healthy competition is engendered by the presentation of shields for the cleanest and best village, and by various other means. Apathy is being overcome. We started broadcasting on an experimental basis, and I am hopeful that, especially now that it is to be organized on a wide scale by the Government of India, it will prove a valuable auxiliary.

Such, in very brief outline, is the Village Improvement Scheme which was brought into being in the Bombay Presidency. The progress already made is due to the sound fundations upon which it rests, its universal appeal, and the devotion and cooperation of innumerable workers, official and non-official, men and women, high and low, of all castes and creeds. Work fraught with such immense potentialities which has started so vigorously will, I am confident, continue to receive active and growing support. I trust that it will eventually be entirely in the people's own hands, and become a scheme, not of village improvement, but of village self-improvement, and will pave the way to a combined All-India movement coordinated by the Central Government.

Treaty Viewed As Useless To Pacific Peace

Pedro Guevara, Philippine Commissioner, Discusses Independence Problem

The mastery of the Pacific is the biggest question confronting the United States today, and if the United States and other world powers fail to take cognizance of this fact, the result may be the establishment in the Far East of a situation tantamount to the Polish corridor problem in Europe.

This was the opinion expressed in Honolulu recently by Pedro Guevara, Philippines commissioner, who is on board the President Coolidge, en route back to Washington for the opening of the next session of congress, according to the Honolulu Star Bulletin.

Discussing all phases of the Philippine independence problem in an interview, the Filipino representative to congress attached special importance to the international complications involved and gave frank expressions of his views concerning them.

'Polish Corridor' Looms

"As to general conditions in the Philippines," Mr. Guevara said during the interview, "I am afraid that somewhere in the southern islands there looms a new 'Polish corridor,' similar to that which has cost and is still costing a great amount of trouble for many nations of Europe."

Asked to enlarge upon this statement, Mr. Guevara merely smiled, pointed out that this section of the islands is the key point to both the Far East and Australia and told the interviewer to "draw your own conclusions."

"Present conditions and the now existant policy regarding the Far East should be the chief concern of American statesmanship," he asserted. "Whether or not the American people would be willing to continue to hold their commanding position in world affairs seems to be a great dilemma for everybody concerned.

No Choice for U. S.

"The American people, I know, are reluctant to become entangled in foreign affairs. But whether or not the United States wants to become entangled, she can not help herself.

"We have the hysterical example of the World war. The United States never expected to be a party to it—but what happened. Before she knew it she was in it."

Asked to express an opinion on the proposition that the Philippines, after independence, might be protected by a neutralization treaty, Commissioner Guevara said he was strongly opposed to such a plan.

"The proposal for a neutralization treaty for the Philippines, to be entered into by Japan, England, the United States and perhaps some other nations with interests in the Far East, would, in my opinion, be the most dangerous plan that could be undertaken in view of the latest developments in international affairs.

Neutralization Treaty Useless

"The League of Nations and the Kellogg pact have been flagrantly violated and a neutralization treaty for the Philippines would be equivalent to delivery of that country to a nation, party to the treaty, which would be more active and aggressive than the others.

"To my mind, there is no doubt as to what the outcome would be. The United States, judging from her present temper, would not be willing to wage war on any nation just for a Philippines neutralization treaty; she would act just as she did when the Kellogg pact was violated. As for France and England, they would be satisfied if they were given proper assurances that their interests in the Far East be duly respected, and would not fight with any nation for the sake of the Philippine islands."

Should Join Conference

Mr. Guevara said he believed the Philippines should send a representative to the forthcoming London naval conference, but added that no steps have yet been taken in this direction.

"I wish to make as my own suggestion to United States and the Philippines that the latter country should have at least an unofficial observer at the naval conference, in order that it may properly formulate its own international policy," he said. "In any event, there is nothing to prevent the Philippines from sending an unofficial observer to the conference.

"In my opinion, this will be a highly important conference for the future international policy of the United States and her economic policy in the Far East will greatly depend upon the outcome of the negotiations."

Need for Amendments

Regarding the economic situation of the Philippines, he asserted that recent developments may emphasize the need for certain amendments to the Tydings-McDuffie independence act for the islands.

"I am glad to learn that a congressional committee, headed by Senator Tydings, has finally decided to visit the Philippines," he said when advised that the senatorial party will arrive here Monday en route to Manila.

"I have no doubt that when the committee sees for itself the conditions in the islands and the whole Far East, it will be decided that the economic provisions of the independence act should be amended immediately. Otherwise, our economic system will be gradually absorbed by countries other than he United States.

"At the present time the Philippines market is being invaded by cheap merchandises, thus increasing our imports without increasing our exports. When I left Manila the legislators were considering an amendment to the tariff law, to prevent such invasions of cheap goods."

Mr. Guevara disclosed that this will be his chief concern when he gets back to Washington, that of working for amendments to the economic phases of the independence act.

He said he favors the continuance of present trade relations between the United States and the Philippines, but added that if this is found impossible, a program will be drafted for a reciprocal treaty whereby each of the two nations would protect the trade of the other.

Ellen McAdoo, Actor Wed In Albuquerque

Senator's Daughter Becomes Mrs. Ralph de Onate

Ellen Wilson McAdoo, granddaughter of the late President Wilson, and Ralph Lopez de Onate, film actor, overcame the last obstacle to their romance and were married in Albuquerque, New Mexcio on Nov. 10, says the New York Herald Tribune. They then left by airplane for an unannounced destination, with the blessing of the bride's father, Senator William Gibbs McAdoo.

"It all goes to show the truth of the old adage that 'love laughs at locksmiths'," Senator McAdoo, in Los Angeles, said jovially. "You can say for me that I am sure my daughter and her husband will be very happy."

The wedding had been postponed when California officials refused to grant a license until the Manila-born De Onate gave proof he was not of Malay extraction.

Shortly after the couple first filed notice in California of intention to wed, Senator McAdoo let it be known he would withdraw his daughter's $1,000 monthly allowance if the marriage took place. Mrs. McAdoo was reported "prostrated in bed" over the affair. Later, Senator McAdoo withdrew his objections.

Miss McAdoo and the tall, dark-haired motion picture actor slipped away from Los Angeles late yesterday and arrived last night by airplane at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Keleher here.

De Onate, who passed the night at a hotel, joined Miss McAdoo early this morning at the home of the Albuquerque attorney. The county clerk was summoned to issue a marriage license. Miss McAdoo gave her age as nineteen, De Onate as thirty-eight.

Then, with Mr. and Mrs. Keleher attending, they were wed by the Rev. George J. Weber, Congregaional minister.

Miss McAdoo was attired in a black dress, relieved only by its white collar. De Onate wore a dark business suit. They left soon by airplane for an unannounced destination.

Thus did the culmination of their love affair contrast with the furore that attended the discoverey that Miss McAdoo and De Onate had applied October 22 at Riverside, Calif., for a marriage license. After the girl's parents had expressed immediate objection and county officials had declined to issue a license until the former export broker could produce proof that he was not of Malay blood, the marriage was announced as having been indefinitely postponed."

De Onate declared he could produce ample proof of pure Spanish ancestry and thus meet requirements of California law forbidding marriage between persons of Malay descent with Caucasians. Senator McAdoo withdrew his objections, speaking also, he said, for Mrs. McAdoo.

"Ellen," he said, "is nineteen years of age, and capable of choosing her own husband.'

However, the notice of intention filed at Riverside, had never been claimed and, instead, the couple arranged for the ceremony at Albuquerque.

Arizona Orders Martial Law In Dam Site War

National Guard Called Out To Prevent Building Of Bridge Over Colorado River

Martial law was invoked by Governor B. B. Moeur of Arizona on Nov. 10 in an apparent attempt to stop the Federal government and the metropolitan water district of California from building the Parker diversion dam across the Colorado River.

Twenty machine gunners and forty infantrymen were ordered out to augment a guard squad already on the scene, says the New York Herald Tribune. The troops were instructed to "repel the threatened invasion of the sovereignty and territory of the State of Arizona."

A declaration that Arizona's Governor might find himself in the position of using National Guard troops to "fight" the United States government was made by one California water district official who declined to allow the use of his name.

An intimation that the matter was beyond the pale of Arizona's authority was dropped in Washington by Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes, whose department has supervision of the big construction project.

"We have," said Ickes, "a fairly respectable legal opinion that the Federal government has jurisdiction over navigable streams (the dangerous Colorado River has been held navigable in the area involved). Under this opinion, it is believed the United States has a right to decide a question of the sort involved here."

Telegraphs to President

Governor Moeur immediately telegraphed President Roosevelt outlining the action taken and explaining his reasons. Adjutant General Oscar Temple, of the National Guard, said it was the first time in Arizona history that martial law had been declared.

Moeur's sudden move was another ramification of the long struggle between Arizona, on one hand, and the six other states involved in the Colorado River compact for the building of Boulder Dam and the distribution of river water, much of it to the thickly populated metropolitan area of southern California.

Arizona contended the compact did not give her a just share in the great project. Despite this, the Federal government went ahead with the construtcion of Boulder Dam, the great structure which will hold back the flood waters and from a huge lake which both cities and irrigated farms will be supplied.

The site of the dispute is a desolate, uninhabited area on the river which serves as the border line between Arizona and Colorado. There a diversion dam is being built to supply southern California with water.

Recently Arizona demanded of Secretary Ickes a contract which would give Arizona a share in the hydroelectric power to be generated at Parker Dam and storage without cost to that state of 2,800,000 acre feet of water from Boulder Dam. The other states in the Colorado compact fought the Arizona demand as "unjust" and Ickes did not sign. He said, however, half the power was reserved for Arizona.

Bridge Building Balked

Construction plans for Parker Dam went on and a pile bridge was started at the site by Six Companies, Inc., Boulder Dam contractors.

"The bridge," said Governor Moeur in his martial law proclamation, "is being constructed without authority of law and without consent of the State of Arizona."

Moeur's proclamation ordered the Arizona National Guard to "take possession" of a rugged little patch of desert three miles long and one mile wide, beginning in the center of the river and extending one mile eastward. The order directed the troops to present "any and all persons trespassing thereon" and "to prevent the construction of the said bridge on the Arizona side of the state boundary."

The Los Angeles metropolitan water dstrict official argued that the National Guard was as much under the command of the President of the United States as is the Regular Army.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Puente Del Inca

This natural bridge formed in the calcarous rock by the force of the waters, spans a stream gorge in the Argentine Andes at a height of about 70 feet. The bridge is about 130 feet long and 100 feet wide. From its unique pillar surge warm springs having a constant temperature of from 85 to 90 degress F. In the ravine are many bubbling wells the most famous of which is Pozo Champagne (Champagne Well). The bridge has given its name to a famous spa in the Argentine nearby, and is an interesting feature of the Andean scenery.

Mrs. Burton Crane discussed the practical value of handcrafts at the regular meeting Monday afternoon at the Y.W.C.A. She told of occupational therapy which is being developed in many hospitals in the United States among disabled persons. Particularly is this work stressed in hospitals for disabled war veterans and in institutions for the blind and others likewise handicapped. Through the work with handcrafts, disabled persons not only find something to keep their hands and mind busy but something which also has a commercial value. In some cases, they can become self-supporting through their handwork.

Mrs Crane said that although the depression had an unfortunate effect on the sales of the handwork of the disabled, it did bring a greatly renewed interest to hand-made products.

Discussing exhibitions of home-made articles, Mrs. Crane said that there had been many in the United States recently and she referred to the recent exhibit at the Takashimaya department store here and to the exhibit of hand-made pottery held recently at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Kisaburo Fukui.

Another practical value of handcrafts, Mrs. Crane said, is that it is a means of teaching art to children. A third value is its use in social settlement work. She illustrated her talk with beautifully hand woven articles lent by Mrs. Valvanne, wife of the Finnish minister. Mrs. J. D. Hitch, Jr., president of the club presided and Mrs. Russell Durgin introduced the speaker.

HOME PROBLEM CLUB

The December meeting of the Home Problem club will be held at the home of Mrs. Russell Durgin, 5 of 7 2-chome, Fujimi-cho, Kojimachi at 10 a.m. Wednesday. Friends of the club are invited to attend. Mrs. Durgin's home may be reached from Iidabashi station on the Chuo line.

KOBE ON THE SCREEN

As a result of a little good-natured rivalry between Kobe and Osaka, motion pictures of Kobe and its surrounding beauty spots may soon be secured free of charge by any organization in Japan which who would like to to show them.

A dispatch to The Japan Times & Mail from Kobe says:

"In view of the recent frantic effort on the part of the Osaka citizens to deprive the shipping business of Kobe by improving their port, Mr. K. Obara, president of the Aiko-kai (the Harbor Loving Association of Kobe) and Mr. Nishida, proprietor of the Kikaku Japanese Soy Manufacturing Company, started the production of a reel of films three months ago, with illustrations of Kobe and vicinity."

Mr. Obara said the pictures consist of three parts. They show the water front of Kobe with some scenes of landing and customs examinations, views of neighboring districts including Suma and Akashi, and annual festivals and general scenes in Kobe. The pictures will be ready for use soon.

Smuts Protests Against Talk Of War In London

Eminent South African Speaks Before Royal Institute Of International Affairs

General Smuts, who was the guest of the Royal Institute of International Affairs at dinner at the Savoy Hotel, made an earnest protest against mischievous war talk, urged the importance of recognizing freely, before it is too late, Germany's complete equality of status with her fellows, and appealed in friendly spirit to Japan to pause before jeopardizing the concert in the Pacific. The chair was taken by Lord Derby, who proposed the health of the guest. General Smuts mentioned that this was his last public engagement during his present visit, says The Times, London.

The following are the principal points of General Smuts's address, which is reported fully below:—

Dangerous Complexes

Two underlying forces are today creating and shaping policies in Europe—the fear complex and the inferiority complex. Both are dangerous complexes.

The victors of the Great War, so far from feeling secure in their victory, are in fact obsessed with this almost neurotic fear, and the vanquished are reacting in the obvious and inevitable way by refusing to accept their enforced inferiority and their position as second-class nations in the comity of civilization.

If Europe is to get back to the right road again, it seems to me necessary that the nations, both victors and vanquished, should be cured of their Freudian obsessions.

One of the symptoms of this fear complex is the war talk which is now so common. With all the emphasis at my command I would call a halt to this war talk as propaganda. The expectation of mischievous and dangerous war war tomorrow or in the near future is sheer nonsense, and all those who are conversant with affairs know it.

Today it is not the military, but the economic, front which dominates the thoughts of statesmen.

Method of the League

The remedy for this fear complex is the Freudian way of dragging it out from its hidden depth, bringing it into the open, and exposing it to the light of day. And this is exactly the method of the League of Nations.

It is said that the crucial case of Manchoukuo has exposed its real weakness, and shown that, unless armed with force to carry out its policies, it is doomed. I cannot visualize the League as a military machine. It was not conceived or built for that purpose; it is not equipped for such functions.

I cannot conceive the Dominions remaining in such a League and pledging themselves to fight the wars of the Old World; and, if the Dominions leave it, Great Britain is bound to follow. I cannot conceive anything more calculated to keep the U.S.A. for ever out of the League than its transformation into a fighting machine, obliged to carry out its decisions by force of arms it necessary.

A conference room of the nations the U.S.A. can and eventually will join; it can never join an international War Office.

Experience since the inception of the League has in fact taught us the way out Locarno has been incorporated into the League or the collective peace system. And Locarno establishes the principle of limited sanctions, of a smaller group within the League entering into mutual defensive arrangements under the aegis, and subject to the control, of the League.

The Eastern Pact or Locarno which the late M Barthou proposed for Eastern Europe, as modified by the British Government, would, if it does not miscarry, be another such system of limited sanctions to buttress peace within the League.

German Equality

How can the inferiority complex which is obsessing and, I fear, poisoning the mind, and indeed the very soul, of Germany be removed? There is only one way, and that is to recognize her complete equality of status with her fellows, and to do so frankly, freely, and unreservedly.

Some people consider magnanimity out of place in international affairs. I have seen it in my own country, recreate a position of dangerous potentialities into one of everlasting friendship between victor and vanquished.

The time is come to complete that true peace which we admittedly failed to make at Versailles.

Germany has declared that if she were in principle accorded equality of rights she was in practice willing to limit her defensive armaments so as to be no danger to her neighbours.

Repugnant as the principles of Nazism may be to many other Western peoples, that it is no reason why Germany's equal international position should not be recognized and the obsessions which lie at the root of Nazism thereby removed.

Appeal to Japan

In the Far East a cloud is appearing which, although it is at present no greater than a man's hand, may come to overhadow the whole international sky.

I would appeal most earnestly, and in the friendliest spirit, to Japan, as our old friend and Wartime ally, to pause before she puts in motion machinery which will in the end imperil the concert in the Pacific.

Even if the present negotiations for naval ratios fail, do not let us depart from an attitude of friendliness and large human good-will toward Japan.

Association With U.S.

I wish to make another point which I consider no less important and vital. To me the future policy and association of our great British Commonwealth lie more with the U.S.A. than with any other group in the world. If ever there comes a parting of the ways, if ever in the crises of the future we are called upon to make a choice, that it seems to me should be the company we should prefer to walk with and march with to the unknown future. On that both lie our past affiliations; our common moral outlook, our hopes and fears for the future of our common civilization.

The British Commonwealth has its feet in both worlds. Through Great Britain its one foot is firmly planted on this old Continent. Through the Dominions it has its other foot as firmly planted in the outer newer world where the U.S.A. already plays so great a part. The Dominions have even stronger affiliations towards the U.S.A. than Great Britain has.

While, therefore, our Far Eastern policy should be based on friendship with all, and exclusive alliances or understandings with none, the ultimate objective of that policy should continue to conform to that general American orientation which has distinguished it since our association with the U.S.A. in the Great War.

Stevens's Rift With Premier Stirs Canada

of evidence of black sheep in Canadian business, it was enlarged into a royal commission to investigate to its heart's content. Its revelations of sweated labor and financial piracy aroused general disgust. Then came the famous pamphlet, mimeographed and distribued by an Ottawa club which Mr. Stevens had addressed. It embodied the salient points of his talk, in which he had castigated severely many individual Canadian business institutions and business practices, which charges he said had been proved before the commission.

While Mr. Bennett was in Geneva attending a League of Nations session, the lash of Mr. Stevens's tongue again fell on sensitive backs in high places as he stumped Ontario in federal by-election campaign. Home from abroad, the Prime Minister appeared determined to crack down.

Other cabinet ministers assailed Mr. Stevens. Mr. Bennett himself declared that Mr. Stevens had been guilty of prejudging a case into which he was still inquiring, and also of speaking out of turn as a minister of the crown on matters about which his colleagues in the government should have been consulted. Asked to withdraw his charges and admit himself at fault in forgetting the rigid nature of cabinet responsibility, Mr. Stevens refused and again tendered his resignation, which this time was accepted promptly.

In demanding Mr. Stevens's resignation, it is readily admitted, Mr. Bennett displayed considerable courage, as he is too astute and experienced a politician not to realize that the government would be accused of being the tool of big business and he, the millionaire Prime Minister, its mouthpiece. No less is it admitted that Mr. Stevens, who is by no means wealthy, threw up a $10,000-a-year job to stick by his guns and continue his battle for the "inarticulate majority."

Undoubtedly Mr. Stevens's action has hastened a federal election in Canada, although it will not be this year.

Dupont In Favor Of Control In Munitions

fabric of American industry of effective nuclei for the rapid expansion of munitions production in an emergency is of vital importance.

Two objections to private manufacture of munitions in general and ordnance in particular are raised; excess of war profits, and abuses attending the traffic in arms. These we shall try to deal with in turn.

Against Big War Profits

We subscribe to the view that excess war profits should be eliminated. There is a popular demand, which is sound and just, that in the event of any such future national crisis as a major war the entire capital and productive resources of our country should be subjected to the national need without the prospect of extraordinary compensation. The national policy should be based on the principle that in time of national emergency, when the country's man power is being mobilized, its material resources should be mobilized also.

A plan for carrying out this policy must consist of practical measures. It must be sure to succeed. It must harness every effort, employ every motive to insure speed, efficient operation, low costs, elimination of waste, conservation of materials, saving of labor. Further, it must be all inclusive in scope, extended throughout the whole fabric of our economic structure. Elimination of excessive earnings must apply to every business and every individual.

Should Study All Sides

The formulation of a comprehensive and practical plan is a problem of tremendous difficulty. The committee will appreciate that the recapture of profits in excess of peace time earnings contemplates a new and drastic measure. The dangers of such a radical departure from normal economic habits may not be appreciated.

We should be negligent if we failed to emphasize the national perils which would lurk in a superficial or unsound attempt at its solution. It can only be solved by able and exhaustive study. There is still available for this study the experienced judgment of the men who successfully conducted America's effort in the World War. To it should be applied the wisest minds of financiers, business executives, military experts statesmen.

The time to make this study and elaborate a plan is now, when no immediate danger threatens our country. It would be too late when hostilities are imminent, for impromptu measures would surely be ineffective.

Recommend Detailed Study

We recommend, therefore, that a thorough and detailed study of the problem be made by such agency as the Congress may determine with the view of developing a practical and effective plan of industrial mobilization for the national defense without excess profits to corporation or individual.

We believe that international trade in arms can be done away with, if that is a desirable aim, only by international agreement between all the producing nations, about 12 in number, to prohibit exports

Whether the cessation of this trade, which would tend toward the fixation of the status quo of oppressed and unarmed peoples, is desirable, is a question upon which we do not venture an opinion. It would seem likely that one prompt result would be the erection for their own defense of ordnance plants throughout the world, imposing through excessive costs additional burdens upon them, and that a new competition in armament would thus spring on

Danger of Reprisals

If the United States alone were to forbid the export of munitions, our national defense would be impaired, because such a policy of isolation might prompt reprisals and make it difficult or impossible in an emergency for this country to obtain essential materials from abroad.

In any case the question would arise, what constitutes munitions of war? Numerous harmless articles of peace-time commerce, the trade in which should not be inhibited, assume in war time greater military significance and strategic importance than many articles of ordinance. Prohibition of the traffic in arms might not be effective, and it would encourage illicit dealings.

Rather we feel that the international trade in arms should be subjected to a strict governmental control, preferably by international agreement. At any rate the United States can immediately initiate its own policies in this respect.

Check on Arms Export

We suggest legislation permitting the export of arms from this country only after the vise of orders by a federal government bureau or commission as the Congress may determine. If this commission made objection shipment would not be permitted. Moreover, such legislation should require that upon consummation of an order full information must be reported to the commission, including the amount and description of goods, their destination, and the complete financial settlement of the transaction.

Such a system of control, while permitting legitimate sales of arms for indispensable demands, would eliminate any abuses that may exist in the business and would prevent improper sales where arms are desired for unlawful purposes.

What Causes Wars

We think it fundamental to distinguish between the causes and effects of war. Armament does not originate war; warfare brings forth arms. War is caused by economic and political rivalries.

It is fomented by fanaticism, bad temper, suspicion of other people, criticism of their motions, sensational press dispatches, fraudulent or covetous practices.

It is minimized by good will, forbearance, self-control, honest statement, fair dealing. Firefighting apparatus is necessary, but it does not cause the fire; care and vigilance are required to prevent an outbreak of fire.

International trade in any kind of material or product, if unwisely directed and improperly prosecuted, creates friction, animosity, hostility. On the other hand, international trade wisely and fairly conducted promotes closer association with other people, understanding and friendliness, a spirit of co-operation, good will peace.

The Tombs of the Living

The Greeks who inhabited Sicily in ancient times built a rockhewn necropolis (burial ground) near Syracuse. In modern days the necropolis has been employed to house the living instead of the dead. Generations have been born, lived and have gone to their reward within the same tombs formerly occupied by Greek corpses. Here the order of life is curiously reversed. The inhabitants of the tombs leave them only after they die, when they are interred outside the Tomb City.

Drunk As A Lord

This description has been coined in derision of Henry Baron Brougham and Vaux, one of the greatest English statesmen and one of its most powerful orators (1778-1868).

As Lord Chancellor he delivered one of the longest and most impressive speeches on record on behalf of the Reform Bill of 1832. He spoke for 8 hours, keeping up his energy with draughts of port and cognac. At the end of the oration he fell on his knees and remained kneeling to pray that the Reform Bill be passed. His friends who who noticed that he had drunk 15 water tumblers full of the beverage, thought that he was unable to rise. He was picked up bodily and seated on the woolsack. The opponents of the Reform Bill seized upon this incident the next day when the expression came into being.

Big Plane To Plot Air Line To China

Pan American Airways Fits Sikorsky For Use As Ocean Flight Laboratory

The second of the three giant Sikorsky S-42 flying boats under construcion for Pan-American Airways is to be used as laboratory for transocean flight tests and training with transpacific service the ultimate goal, it became known, says New York Times correspondent in his report from Bridgeport, Conn. His story follows:

In place of passenger accommodations for thirty-two persons, as in the case of the first of these craft, the Brazilian Clipper, which has set ten world's records for flying boat performance, the Clipper No. 5 has been fitted with sleeping quarters for crew and tanks to hold eight and a half tons of fuel, enough for a cruising range of 3,000 miles. This is 1,000 more than the distance from Bermuda to the Azores, the longest over-water stretch of the southern Atlantic route.

A series of new instruments and mechanical aids to navigation, in addition to the regular transport flight instruments, have also been installed under the supervision of Captain Edwin C. Musick, chief pilot of the line. Captain Musick set eight of the ten records made by the earlier sister ship, which Captain Boris Sergievsky, chief test pilot of the Sikorsky plant, also flew to two world marks.

Has Special Pumping System

A special pumping system in the plane conveys fuel from the 1,300-gallon cabin tanks to the wing tanks, which hold an additional 1,270 gallons. Other tanks provide storage for more than half a ton of oil. The manufacturers of the four supercharged Hornet engines have installed a device for forced lubrication of the rocker arms and other parts during flight. A synchronizing device, developed by the airline, times the engines exactly by electrical control. A meter to determine the flow of gasoline to the carburetors is also among the other new instruments.

As soon as test flights for the Department of Commerce certificate and acceptance flights for the airline have been completed, the flying boat will leave Bridgeport for a non-stop flight, out of sight of land, to Miami, the airline's international base. Then a series of test hops will begin, during which the pilots and crews of the line, who have had two or more years of over-water experience on the Caribbean division and other parts of the service to South America, will begin to rotate in trial flights.

Will Use New Devices

These flights, starting at Miami, will be increased in length and varied in direction over the Atlantic until the full range of the boat has been utilized.

Advanced types of radio apparatus, together with a gonimeter, a new direction-finding system which the line has developed during the last year, will be used. Sextants and octants, together with drift indicators, to measure the surface speed over water, are also included in the equipment.

After the flights in the Atlantic and Caribbean have been completed the big plane will be flown to the Pacific Coast and there similar experimental flights, it is understood, will be undertaken over the Pacific, in preparation for regular service from California to Hawaii, and the smaller islands to the Philippines and China. This service will actually be flown by the 50,000-pound Martin flying boats, the first of which is nearing completion at the factory at Baltimore.

Colonel Clarence M. Young, former Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Air, to whom the foundation work of the great system of lighted Federal airways in the United States is credited, has joined the Pan-American organization and will have charge, primarily, of the transocean activities in the Pacific and, later, the Atlantic fields.

The size and capacity of the S-42 type of boat which will be used for the flying laboratory may be realized from the fact that for its record flight with load, 16,608 pounds of payload were carried aloft. This is the equivalent of ninety-three passengers or seven Ford roadsters or two complete Boeing 247 ten-passenger transcontinental land planes.

Mexicans Rush Monument To Madero Revolt

Memorial To The Revolution Is 180 Feet High; Parade Set For Occasion

Hundreds of men are at work rushing to completion the huge monument to the Revolution, to be dedicated early in 1935. A great celebration parade is scheduled for Sunday, November 18, commemorating the anniversary November 20 of the beginning of the Francisco I Madero movement against the dictator-president Porfirio Diaz, says Jack Starr-Hunt in an article to the New York Herald Tribune from Mexico City dated Nov. 1.

The article continues:

Completion of the monument will bring into use the second and last of the two huge steel and stone structural skeletons left unfinished by the Diaz regime, a skeleton converted into a memorial to the social ideas which brought about the dictator's downfall. The other famous "skeleton," now ready for use, is the National Theater (Palace of Fine Arts).

While laborers continue work on the colossal archway, the two artists who won the competition for the symbolic sculptural groups are directing the placing of the huge figures, some of which have been mounted on corners topping the arch and supporting the cupola.

Cupola Lined and Covered

Olivero G. Martinez and Fred Canessi are the two young sculptors whose work was accepted by the committee of which the architect Carlos Obregon Santacilia, was the head. The cupola has been lined and covered and in a few weeks the monument will be ready for its final inspection.

The structure will help rid Mexico of a twenty-year-old puzzle—what to do with the steel skeleton of what was to have been the federal legislative palace of a group of government buildings planned by the Diaz government before the revolutions ended the dictator's "Golden Age." General Plutarco Elias Calles, former President of the republic and now the "Chief of the Revolution," furnished the idea of converting it into a monument resembling the Arc de Triomphe of Paris.

While the French arch is approximately 120 feet high, the Revolution Monument rises 180 feet. The square base measures 100 feet each way and is to be the center of a park area to be known as the Plaza of the Revolution. The plaza will be linked by avenues with the square in which is the equestrian statue of Charles IV and Mexico's most famous boulevard, the Paseo de la Reforma.

The monument, on which is being chiselled the inscription, "To the Revolution of Yesterday, Today, Tomorrow and Forever," is simple in style, the adornments being limited to the four sculptured groups at the heads of the columns. The government specified that the sculpture abstain entirely from representation of individuals, so that the groups represent four epochs during the last two centuries. They are described by the architect and sculptors as follows:

1. Political emancipation, depicting the successful fight for independence from Spain, culminating in the revolution of 1810.

2. Spiritual emancipation, symbolizing the passage of Benito Juarez's laws of the reform in 1857, definitely separating Church and State in the political scheme and marking the beginning of a new political epoch.

3. Agricultural emancipation, depicting the spirit of the Revolution of 1910, headed by Madero, and the alteration in conception of land ownership and distribution.

4. Industrial emanacipation as represented in the constitution of 1917 by the famous Article 123 and the labor laws deriving therefrom.

Perpetual Lighting Planned

The monument's interior will be perpetually lighted—during the day by the sun and at night by an indirect illumination system—through a series of openings on the exterior cupola, the outer wall of which is of metal and the interior covered with glittering tile. Crowning the monument is a powerful searchlight sending a column of brilliant light straight upward.

Completion of the structure is considered one of the big achievements of the present reconstruction program in Mexico City, a compaign marked this year also by completion of the grandiose National Theater, started thirty years ago.

League Success In Leticia 'War' Traced by Report

Commission Scored Triumph To Prove Soundness Of Peace Method

The League of Nations has been so much criticized for its failures in circumstances in which success would have been extraordinary, that it would be improper to pass unnoticed the admirable fulfillment of its difficult task in Leticia. The secretary of the commission, Garcia Palacios, has prepared a report on the work in which the utility of the League in this South American region is unmistakably demonstrated, according to a Geneva dispatch to the Christian Science Monitor.

After the incidents of Sept. 1, 1932, it is recalled, the little town of Leticia, situated in Colombian territory on the banks of the Amazon River was occupied by Peruvian military forces. There were encounters between the Peruvian and Colombian troops posted on the Putomayo River, a tributary of the Amazon.

The affair was brought before the League of Nations in an attempt to put an end to the dispute in this inhospitable district where the forces of nature combined to make war even more cruel and pitiless.

Agreement Signed

After long negotiations in Geneva, and after a great many meetings of the advisory committee specially appointed to follow the affair, the Governments of Peru and Colombia in a laudable effort for peace, signed an agreement putting an end to hostilities. For the maximum period of one year, the agreement placed the administration of Leticia in the hands of a commission appointed by the League, which was to carry out its duties on behalf of the Colombian Government.

The commission appointed by the Council was an innovation and had to set to work without any historical precedent. It was composed of three members: a North American, a Spaniard and a Brazilian, with a secretary who was an official of the League.

To maintain order in the territory, the commission could call on Colombian military forces. This was one of the most important questions for the commission, since the tranquility of the territory depended on it in some measure.

Commission at Work

Typewriters in the commission's office tapped away steadily under the equatorial sun while the inhabitants passed respectfully by or came in to put forward their complaints with a profound belief that the emblem of the League of Nations, represented by a small square of white cloth, was for them a symbol that they would be treated fairly and with justice. To whatever nationality or race they belonged, they felt they would be helped because far away in Geneva men had founded an organization which made no distinction between races, and would protect the rights of all.

Little by little, thanks to the support of the Colombian Government and to the efforts of the commission, a small town emerged from the virgin forest. Roads were marked out, about 100 houses were built or rebuilt; the wireless station was finished; a hospital was established and the installation of electric light was begun. A model school was started and the land made more sanitary by drainage.

The population of the territory rose from 60 to 253. Two or three small shops were opened, and the inhabitants began to feel optimistic. The commission made a vigorous campaign against mosquitoes by draining and reclaiming marshes.

Football, Not War

Some time before the signing of the Rio de Janeiro Agreement, and at a time when the press of the countries was completely preoccupied with the thought of war, the Colombian garrison played football against the Peruvians in Leticia, watched by the members of the commission.

By the terms of its mandate the commission had to confine itself to administrative work, but this was naturally a very delicate task, since it had to work among Colombians and Peruvians, while making use of Columbian troops wearing a League of Nations armlet. Facing it, on the other side of the river, was the Peruvian garrison of Ramon Castillo.

The Rio de Janeiro Agreement includes a Protocol of Peace, Friendship and Cooperation and an Additional Act. During the last phase of the commission's administration it had to prepare for the surrender of the territory and for the liquidation of all current affairs. At 10 o'clock in the morning of June 19, 1934, the protocol providing for the handing over was signed in the commission's office.

The last glimpse the members of the commission had of Leticia from their airplane was of a small town, under the tropical sun, happy in its rebirth. Its future was bright because of League action.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Academy of Poison

Locusta, the most notorious concocter of poison in all history, prepared the poison which killed Emperor Claudius. She was also the poisoner of Britannicus. Emperor Nero often employed her services. He appointed her official poisoner of the Imperial Court, and gave her official absolution of all accusations pending against her. He authorized her to open a public school for poisoning, in which she taught her pupils her art. While she is personally responsible for hundreds of poisonings, at least 10,000 poison crimes can be traced to the pupils she instructed. She was executed, at the order of Emperor Galba, with a great many official criminals who had been exposed at the time.

The Automobile Paradox

An automobile covering half of 50 miles at 30 miles per hour and the other half at 20 miles per hour, will require 2 hours and 5 minutes to cover the entire distance, while the same 50 miles covered at 25 miles per hour will require only 2 hours.

80 Miles An Hour Found Safe Auto Speed In Iowa

AMES, Iowa, Nov. 15—In Iowa, which has adopted the rule of reason in place of arbitrary speed limits, the maximum rate at which an auomobile may be driven is eighty miles an hour, according to the New York Times.

This is the figure set up by Dr. Ralph A. Moyer, Professor of Engineering at Iowa State College, after a series of tests. He recommends this speed as permissible and consistent with safety on trunk highways with clear sight distance of 1,000 feet and the understanding of the driver that he will require 500 feet within which to stop.

He can stop within half that distance at fifty-five miles an hour, according to the tests.

A Grateful Hen

CLARINDA, Iowa—W. A. Burns is quite convinced of the practicability of restoring life to dead animals—or at least fowls. He has done it himself, and that without the use of scientific apparatus or chemical aids.

This is his story: He found one of his chickens apparently drowned in a tub of water. He applied life-saving exercises and then put the hen in a warm oven. Three hours later he came back and not only found the hen alive but with a fresh-laid egg in the oven besides.

New Deal Sets Plans to Make Old Age Secure

U.S. Accused Of Lagging In Social-Economic Laws Sets New Pace

With plans practically matured, with an election mandate that seems to be overwhelming, the Roosevelt Administration is bringing to a final stage a scheme of social security, says the Washington correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, whose article of November 12 follows.

It is such a plan as no other modern industrial nation could bring forward at the present time—largely because the United States, practically alone among great industrial nations, has not pioneered in this field before and has a corresponding opportunity for a tremendous push forward.

Now, from half a dozen directions, the forces are converging for a new chapter in advancing social security —"engineering in human lives" as some experts have called it—and all indications point to a nonpartisan acceptance by Democrats and Republicans alike of many of the proposals to be advanced.

Security Council Named

Over the week-end President Roosevelt has named an Advisory Council on Economic Security of 19, representing big names from capital, labor and consumer groups. This will cooperate with a cabinet committee and an expert committee working since last summer.

A national conference will be held here this week addressed by President Roosevelt with 200 invited authorities present, and others who will probably greatly enhance the number. But this is a small part of the real drive for new legislation which will be made on the forthcoming Congress.

As long ago as June 8, Mr. Roosevelt sent a special message to Congress announcing the next objective of the New Deal, as the "security of the men, women and children of the nation."

The Administration drive then formulated was nonpartisan in its objectives. Two days prior to it (June 6) the National Committee of the Republican Party indorsed old age and unemployment legislation. Candidates for the recent election from all over the United States took a stand in favor of general proposals of this and other types. The results of the election now in show the widespread nature of the forthcoming drive. Concurrently with the studies made by the specially appointed presidential committee this summer, members of the Administration visited Europe to study Old World plans. The Administration's attitude was announced on all sides.

Ready to Go Ahead

"We are coming to unemployment insurance in some form," said Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, on his return from Europe. Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor and head of the Cabinet committee on economic security, has made virtually the same statement.

With this development in the federal field, the new Governors of New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, California, Massachusetts, Connecticut, South Carolina and Alabama, elected or reelected, have announced among others their intention to fight for social legislation.

For example, George H. Earle (D), the new Governor of Pennsylvania, said he believed unemployment insurance "more necessary in our times than any other reform"; Frank F. Merriam who defeated Upton Sinclair, Socialist, made his campaign on a platform of unemployment insurance, health insurance and old age pensions.

Indorsed by members of both parties and with the active push of Mr. Roosevelt behind it, the stage seems set for one of the most significant advances of social legislation by any big country in many years.

To Make Up Lost Time

Experts studying the question seem to feel America has lagged in this field.

"China, India and the United States remain the only large countries without any national system of old-age security," said Abraham Epstein, executive secretary of the American Association for Social Security, Inc. However, 27 separate states have now some kind of legislation in this particular field on their statute books.

In this field, the Dill-Connery bill, in the last Congress, would provide a system of federal aid up to one-third of their expenditures to states paying pensions, and it is along this line that new recommendations are expected by the President's committees. The cabinet committee is required to report by Dec. 1, less than three weeks ahead.

Dr. Schuschnigg And Duce Plan Austrian Treaty

Want Guarantee Which Makes Nation 'Switzerland Of Central Europe'

Premier Benito Mussolini and Kurt Schuschnigg, Austria's Chancellor, agreed on Nov. 17 that Austria must be made the Switzerland of central Europe.

Either Germany must voice her unmistakable intention to let Austria alone or Germany must sign an agreement with other European nations guaranteeing Austria's independence, the two statesmen decided, says the New York Herald Tribune.

A government spokesman announced that the two men, meeting in the first of the series of conversations scheduled during Dr. Schuschnigg's four-day visit to Rome, discussed at great length ways permanently to guarantee Austria's continuance as an independent nation.

Neutrality Pact Preferred

Of the two courses they decided alone were possible, the second—a treaty to which Germany and all other major European powers would adhere—was preferred.

The conversations continued the same night at a formal dinner which Mussolini gave in the visitor's honor.

Mussolini gave what was interpreted as an invitation to Germany to join a pact guaranteeing Austrian independence in his dinner-table speech.

He declared the Austro-Italian understanding "isn't intended to prevent the establishment of friendships with other nations." He added that political and economic pacts existing between Italy, Austria and Hungary are "open to all who pursue the same ideals and ends." Those entering, however, must, he said, "accept certain conditions." This was taken to mean that Austrian independence is the guiding principle.

In his return speech Schuschnigg again laid the Anschluss ghost by declaring Austria is determined to "maintain her independence in the interests of European peace."

Regarding reports of differences between Italy and Austria as a result of Schuschnigg's recent conversations with Pan-Germanists, both speakers made emphatic statements to the effect that Italo-Austrian policies continue to harmonize.

Pan-Germanists Active

The sore point of the Austrian Chancellor's talk with the Pan-Germanists was brought up during the conference at Venezia Palace, and Schuschnigg is said to have convinced Il Duce the talks did not mean that he had any intention of admitting into his government the Pan-German sympathizers. He has maintained it is better to have the friendship of the Pan-Germans than their enmity. Mussolini was said to have agreed on this point, as long as friendship did not signify influence.

The Austrian Chancellor, who arrived on Nov. 16 amid typical Fascist pomp and ceremony, was but little satisfied with the tripartite declaration England, France and Italy made at the last Assembly of the League of Nations, it was disclosed.

He felt that assertion was comparatively weak, and that some stronger bulwark against threats to Austria's freedom was needed.

Italy, France and England joined last September in renewing the tripower declaration they made in February, when Socialist revolution flared in Austria, concerning "the necessity of maintaining the independence and integrity of Austria, in conformity with existing treaties." . . . .

Mussolini and Schuschnigg, the government spokesman said, met to demonstrate to the world that the Austrian problem still exists.

"Attention has been turned to another focal point in Europe, the Saar," he said. "But the Saar question will soon be resolved, whereas the Austrian question still exists."

Austria's Foreign Minister, Egon Berger-Waldenegg, and the Italian Under Secreary of State, Fulvio Suvich, were present at the conference, held in the Venezia Palace, at which, it was understood, the two leaders also talked over Schuschnigg's recent conversations with Vienna Pan-Germanists.

The subject of relations between Austria and Yugoslavia also came up for consideration, it was stated.

After the morning's meeting with Mussolini, Schuschnigg visited St. Peter's Cathedral briefly and afterward drove to the seashore at Ostia. He passed the entire afternoon there, returning to Rome just in time to dress for the state dinner Mussolini gave in his honor.

The newspaper "Il Tevere" on Nov. 17 unleased a violent attack on Yugoslavia. Referring to the Battle of Kussovo, between the Serbs and the Turks, "Il Tevere" said: "In truth we would even make ourselves Turks in order to bring them back to their senses once and for all."

Italy in general looks with disfavor upon Yugoslavia's intention of bringing before the League of Nations the question of responsibility for King Alexander's assassination.

The new Austrian Minister to Italy, Vollgruber, was placed in an embarrassing situation in connection with Schuschnigg's visit. The absence of King Victor Emmanuel III in Somaliland, Italy's colonial African possession, has prevented him from presenting his credentials, and, therefore, he is not yet accredited.

Mussolini has been content, however, to overlook the technicality and allow the minister to function as such.

Venice In Danger From Decay Of Historic Houses

dei Camerlenghi, the former Fondaco dei Tedeschi ,now the General Post Office, the Palazzo Pesaro, which contains the Modern Art Gallery, and the Ca d'Oro. The causes of deterioration are many and varied; some are natural, others technical and due to the particular difficulty of any maintenance and restoration work, and others, again, economic, in consequence of a progressive decline in the value of the buildings.

Causes of Decay

Among the particular causes of decay are mentioned the damp and the salt which corrode building materials, particularly wood, iron, and mortar. The damage directly done by the water, which in the majority of the buildings is in contact with the foundations, is caused by the water of the canals and "rii" being in continual movement, partly by action of the tides, and partly by waves which are produced by steamers and motor-boats. The tide, which is rather high in Venice as in the whole of the Adriatic, sweeps the sea into the cracks between the stonework, and then sucks it out again, carrying away fragments of mortar. The peculiar nature of the subsoil also has its influence on the buildings.

To prevent decay would entail maintenance work so frequent and costly as to make impossible a comparison with similar work in other cities. Properly to provide for the maintenance of the foundations it is necessary to undertake extensive repairs involving the use of caissons to drain the whole of the foundations, and this entails a very heavy expenditure which landlords cannot face. In repairs generally expensive materials are required, besides long, difficult, and delicate work.

In view of the low commercial value of a great number of monumental palaces, few private landlords can undertake such costly work. In Venice, while the burden of maintenance and repairs on buildings is exceptionally heavy, compared with that of other cities, the returns and freehold values are relatively lower. This is partly explained by the fact that the ground floors are not habitable, and partly by the vast size of the rooms of the great palaces, which are not adapted to life as it is lived today. Rents are low, both for apartments and shops, and the number of empty rooms has been steadily increasing. On April 15, 1933, there were 456 apartments and 463 shops empty, and on the same date this year the figures were respectively 883 and 841. Another factor which makes maintenance and restoration particularly burdensome and almost prohibitive is the high cost of labor.

Mortgaged Properties

To all this must be added the heavy burden of taxation. Much of the house property in Venice is already heavily mortgaged. In consequence of the economic depression, which the city, naturally, has not escaped, new building is almost at a standstill, while the reverse is the case in the quarters of the city, such as Marghera and Mestre, which are on the mainland. This economic depression has been aggravated by the transfer elsewhere of certain industries, firms, and public offices.

Briefly, therefore, the commission found that serious and progressive deterioration of the buildings was taking place, due to the corrosive action of the water and to the ever-increasing want of repair. The possible remedies which the commission recommends are: periodical excavation of the "rii" by means of drainage, and at the same time repairs to the foundations; assistance from public bodies for the more costly restoration work; premiums for repairs and hygienic improvements; reduction in labour costs; facilities for loans; and the introduction of certain regulations governing the type of steamer and motor-boat to be allowed on the canals. It also advocates temporary exemptions from building taxation for those palaces where improvements and repairs have been carried out; abolition of the tax on building materials; and an attempt to check the flow of Venetians to the mainland.

Until They Met Again

Sam Davis, who now lives in Breensburg, Indiana, while working in a brickyard in 1901 one day carved his name on a brick. In 1932, Davis moved into his present home and while cleaning up his place found the same brick on which the words "Sam Davis, 1901" had been carved 31 years before.

The Smoking Fireplug

The fireplug at Delaware Avenue and Chestnut Street, Philadelphia is called "dummy" because it is not connected with the water main. The pipe merely runs down underneath into the Delaware River, and in case of fire a pumping engine is hooked on to fill the hose. But the plug is not a dummy" as it can smoke a cigarette. The water inside the pipe rises and falls with the tide, enlarging and restricting the air chamber in the plug. This variance in the air chamber creates a suction which will keep a cigarette going when stuck in the small hole in the plug cap.

"THE MESSIAH" SUNG

A chorus of 70 voices sang Handel's famous oratorio, "The Messiah" at the Nippon Seinen Kai hall, Aoyama, Saturday evening. The program was impressive and unfailingly inspiring. The exacting music, the English text (foreign to the majority of the singers), the length of the composition, all these were difficulties admirably surmounted by Director Ugo Nakada. Especially fine were Graham Batter, tenor, and Roy McKenlay, bass, in their interpretations of their difficult airs and recitative passages. A large number of foreigners were noted in the audience. Following their example, the entire audience rose as the great "Hallelujah" chorus was sung.

Sugar Industry Demands That Peru Avert Crisis

since the days of prosperity. New progressive income taxes and rising prices for guano hit farmers heavily, it is said.

The memorial declared that sugar must complete with protected and subsidized sugar in foreign markets, and was at a tremendous disadvantage in distance from Europe. Santo Domingo, the nearest competitor, enjoys a three-to-five advantage in ton rates, it said.

The society urged a commercial treaty with Great Britain to insure a fixed percenage of consumption. It pointed out the possible necessity of limiting or paralyzing work on the sugar estates.

Discuss Cut in Freight Rates

Members of the society met with the Finance Minister to discuss relief measures, including reduction of railway and steamship rates.

Richard J. Lockett, long a resident here and prominent in sugar interests, supports the opinions that the industry is in a precarious condition. The price has fallen steadily for five years, nullifying efforts to economize. Capital is exhausted because of below-cost prices, so that mills may close, unable to obtain credit and facing the closure of the English market. Although the present price level may be transitory, Mr. Lockett expects a protracted period before prices high enough to over production costs will be reached. He believes that the government should eliminate duties, taxes, etc., contributed by the industry, and take steps to enlarge the markets for other industries as well.

16 Fly From NY To Florida And Back In A Day

Rickenbacker Plane Establishes Record For Round 2,400 Mile Hop

A great silvery monoplane drifted down to a landing on Newark Airport at 11:27 p.m. November 13 with sixteen persons aboard. The Florida Flier, which left Newark for Miami the same morning at daylight, had completed the round trip of 2,400 miles in less than fifteen hours' flying time according the New York Times.

On board were Captain Eddie Rickenbacker and Mrs. Rickenbacker ,and twelve other passengers besides the two pilots, Erlon H. Parker and Gene Brown, crack mail fliers for Eastern Air Lines.

Rickenbacker Disappointed

While the flight was a record for passenger planes, Captain Rickenbacker was disappointed. At 6 p.m. November 13 ten minutes before the take-off, the World War ace had said confidently that he expected to be back in Newark by 8 p.m. the same day.

The flight, which initiated a new eight-hour service to Miami starting the next day was made in the same Douglas airliner that brought Rickenbacker and another passenger list across the country from Los Angeles a few days previously in a little more than twelve hours.

Head winds cut down the speed, winds carrying snow squalls and blowing as high as fifty miles an hour at times.

The Florida Flier was due in Washington on November 13 morning at 7:05. It was thirty-four minutes late. Mechanics worked furiously to fill the gasoline tanks, and after a nineteen-minute stop Parker nosed the huge monoplane up over the wooded Virginia hills for Jacksonville.

The winds blew even more furiously and twenty minutes out of Washington the plane plowed through a sleet and snow squall. Richmond passed beneath at 8:35 a.m., according to The Associated Press. Officials at the Byrd Airport said the plane was flying at about 8,000 feet and throughout the flight the pilots held that altitude or went slightly higher.

The Flier was next sighted at Raleigh, N. C., and again shortly after 10 o'clock Parker saw the blue Atlantic over the snub nose of his ship near Charleston, S. C. Speed so far had been around 150 to 170 miles an hour, with the indicators creeping close to 190 at times, but the winds cut the ground speed down far below that. From time to time Rickenbacker left his seat to go into the pilots' compartment for a few minutes, always to return with a dubious grin as he compared the proposed schedule with the actual time they were making.

It was just two minutes before noon when the plane touched its wheels on Jacksonville Airport, a good hour and twenty minutes behind schedule. There a reception committee greeted those on the plane and precious minutes were lost.

At 2:45 P.M. after a flight under bright skies over the semi-tropical inland waterways of Florida the Flyer rolled to a stop on the Municipal Airport at Miami.

A crowd of 2,000 persons was at the field to greet the party and they were hurried into the city for a civic reception and luncheon. Little time was spent in eating, however, and back to the airport they drove behind a police escort.

At the Miami Bilmore, where the party went for luncheon, they were introduced to Governor Lehman, who is spending a short vacation in Miami, Governor Lehman congratulated Captain Rickenbacker on the speed of the new transport and the successful flight and wished him a good trip home.

The southbound trip had taken 8 hours and 35 minutes, of which 7 hours and 54 minutes was flying time.

Crosswinds on Return Trip

Rickenbacker hoped for better luck northbound, but the head winds were not tail winds on the return. Instead conditions shifted and the big machine was bucketed by crosswinds most of the way home.

Darkness overook the Flyer as Parker was letting down his wheels for the landing at Jacksonville, two hours out of Miami. Eighteen minutes later the plane was off once more under floodlights for Washington.

They made good time through the night to Washington, covering the 600 miles, crossing Georgia, the Carolinas and Virginia in 3 hours and 50 minutes.

Again there was an eighteen-minute stop for service and fuel, while a group of friends joshed Rickenbacker for his tardiness and presented to him a box of vegetables as a souvenir.

Record Passenger Flight

It was 10:14 p.m. when the ship roared away from Hoover Airport. One hour and thirteen minutes later Parker set it down at Newark 3 hours and 27 minutes behind schedule but still far ahead of any like flight in a passenger liner.

Total elapsed time for the round trip was 17 hours and 17 minutes. The plane was actually in the air, however, 14 hours and 55 minutes. While no figures were available, the pilots agreed last night that the Florida Flyer had established a new passenger record for the round trip and for both the south and north bound flights. The speed record between New York and Miami is still held by the late James Wedell, who flew the south-bound route a year ago in his racing plane in a 5 hours 1 minutes 30 seconds.

In addition to the Rickenbackers those on board included E. R. Breech, chairman of the board of North American Aviation, a General Motors subsidiary; Ben Smith, New York broker, and a group of newspaper reporters.

Naval Parley's Alleged Failure Laid to Ballyhoo

Some London Observers Would Let Japan Set Pace In Shipbuilding

So far as constructive results are concerned, the five weeks of negotiation at London up to November 24 on limitation of the navies of the United States, Great Britain and Japan may be summed up in one word: Zero. Japan has not budged from her claim for 100 per cent naval equality with the United States. The United States has not conceded an iota beyond the existing 5-5-3 ratio, and Great Britain has joined in insisting that this ratio be maintained, said Mr. Harold E. Scarborough, whose dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune follows.

The certainty of failure for the present naval conversations was admitted yesterday, and it is expected Japan will denounce the Washington treaty before the end of the year. All that is hoped for now is some sort of understanding so negotiations may be resumed later.

On the negative side, however, these London naval talks have not been unfruitful. Shrouded in semi-secrecy, they have produced a plentiful crop of rumors, many of which have been cabled over the world as facts. They have also brought into the open latent suspicions, jealousies and misunderstandings between the three nations.

A Blow to Diplomats

Finally, by their prolongation on the basis of refusal to admit realities, they have, in the opinion of unofficial observers here, served once more to discredit the efficacy of modern diplomatic methods. In this connection the phrase "modern diplomatic methods" is used to denote that facile opportunism which, from Versailles in 1919 to Geneva in 1934, has completely failed to assess with anything like accuracy the motives by which nations have been swayed and the forces behind those motives.

The upshot of the present talks is that Americans are tending to blame the British for not "backing us up"; the British are slightly irritated with the Americans for what they consider an unyielding attitude; while the Japanese, feeling that, as a Tokyo official spokesman said Wednesday, "we are ascending in the world," are resentful of what they conceive to be an Anglo-American effort to keep them in a position of inferiority.

Plain Speaking Urged

If it is asked, "But how could these developments have been avoided?" the answer is admittedly difficult, but there are observers who reply, "By less ballyhoo about the preliminary conversations and by more private plain speaking between the capitals." In support of this view they point out that all that has taken place here thus far has been some fancy skating about the fringes of the underlying situation, which they conceive to be somewhat as follows:

Japan is undergoing a period of imperialist expansion following intensive industrialization, much, for instance, as Germany did during the late nineteenth century. This is resented by the United States, and to a lesser degree by Britain. Whether these combines are prepared to do anything about it remains to be seen. Meanwhile Japan, knowing quite well what she wants, is not in a mood to be bound by treaty restrictions, any more than Germany was

Would Leave It To Japan

Therefore the talk about naval parity for Japan in theory but not in fact, "gentlemen's agreements" and similar quibbles are beside the point. In the circumstances, the United States and Britain might do rather better to drop this undignified huckstering and simply tell the Japanese:

"Very well, gentlemen. We have no desire to coerce you, and if you prefer not to renew the Washington ratios you are at perfect liberty not to do so. We might point out that we on our side will be equally at liberty to maintain those ratios—or better—through the simple process of continuing to build at that rate. But that is up to you."

Japan Ignores Mere Talk

If these observers add, it be objected that this savors too much of big-stick methods, the answer is that nothing in her recent Manchurian policy has indicated that Japan has been influenced in the slightest degree by academic protests.

More than once there have been indications that the American delegates here would have liked to precipitate a showdown, but have been deterred by two considerations. One is that of courtesy to Britain as host. The second is that the British are not certain whether they can afford to follow the United States in such a demarche. Although Britain has greater interests in the Far East than the United States, and although virtually every high British officer publicly expressed disapproval of the treaty limitations imposed on the British fleet, this country has perhaps more pros and cons to balance than has the United States.

A Record In Spite

Joseph Plummer, when a young man of 19, wanted to marry a girl to whom his father strongly objected. If he couldn't marry her, he said, he would go to bed and stay there. His father remained obdurate and so Joseph lived up to this threat until he died 44 years after the vow. During all that time he enjoyed good health and no persuasion could make him change his resolve.

A Ram For $6200

The highest price ever paid for a single head of sheep was $6200 paid by James Stillman of Salina, Utah to John H. Seely & Sons of Mt. Pleasant, Utah, for a Rambouillet Ram. The sale took place at the annual livestock sale in Salt Lake City, Utah, a few years ago. This particular sale gave them a world-wide reputation and since that time entire herds from the Seely farm have been sold at upwards of $1000 a head.

Social and Personal Notes

CHILDREN'S ORCHESTRA

Tokyo society lent an attentive and appreciative ear as Children of the city, playing for the first time in an orchestra of their own, gave a remarkable rendition of Haydn's "Boy Symphony" at the Imperial hotel theater Monday evening.

The program is destined to make musical history in Tokyo for it marks the first time an international group of children, united by the common bond of musical talent and appreciation, have been brought together. That they should have made any public appearance in such a short time was a bold adventure, that they made one marked by such a degree of ability as that Monday evening was most noteworthy. With such a beginning, it is to be hoped that ways and means can be found for the youthful organization to continue intact.

The orchestra, the first part of a musical program presented by the Tokyo Women's Club, was led by 11-year-old Master Arishima who presented a self-composed and attractive figure. The junior musicians, who are pupils of well known music teachers, were:

Piano, the Misses Kato and Mitsui; violin, the Misses Onura, Kawai, Wooyemaka, Durgin, Jorgensen, Romero, and Armstrong and the Masters Fisher, Tsunoda, Mitsui, Hatoyama, Watanabe, Fujita, and Taguchi; cello Master Kawashima; basso, Master Kawashima; Nightingale, Miss Sirota; cuckoo, Miss Fuyita drum, Miss Keenleyside; and Master Langley; rattle, Master Raymond; quail, Master Hannaford; triangle, Master Noble and trumpet, Master Durgin.

Mr. N. Yamamoto, well known conductor, trained the group which put in considerable time and work during the last few weeks, in preparation for the program.

The second part of the program was that of the song-play, "Hansel and Gretel," which was marked by dramatic, dance, and musical talent. The first scene showed Hansel and Gretel playing and dancing in a humble hut on the edge of the forest. Their broom dance and the singing dance, "Little Brother, Come Dance With Me," which is a well known German folk dance, were effectively enacted and proved that the girls had fine dramatic sense as well as pretty voices. Tokoka Sawa took the role of Hansel and Taneko Seki that of Gretel.

Miss Ruth Hansen, as Gertrude, the children's mother, returned to the kitchen to discover that the children had been romping instead of working. In anger, she dispatched them to the forest to pick strawberries.

Tamaki Tokuyama as Peter, the binder of brooms and the children's father, made an effective entry as a light-hearted ne'er-do-well whom fortune had just touched lightly.

The angels in the second scene, laid in the forest, was most picturesque with the spot lights playing on the long robed figures of the girls. Those in this pantomine were the Misses Walser, Brandt, Romero, Gerdts, Jergensen, Durgin, McKinley, Moss, Langley, Lewis, Sirota, Jansen, Crane and Hardwendel.

The final scene, before the cookie and tart house of the witch, presented Yoshiko Sato as an effective which, faithful to the storybook characterization, even to spectacles and cap.

Cookie-children, who were freed of the old witch's spell when Hansel and Gretel succeeded in pushing her into her own oven, were the Misses Osawa, Tagaki, Ino, Daito, Iyima, Yoshida, Nagasawa, Shirao, Fujimura, Yamada, Sato, and Kin.

The entire evening's program was arranged by Madame N. Netke-Loewe, chairman of the music committee of the Tokyo Women's club, who was given a deserving tribute by Mrs. J. D. Hitch, Jr., president of the club, in presenting the program. Prof. M. Mizana had charge of the settings which contributed to the artistic success of the evening.

The auditorium was filled to capacity. Many of those coming late found it difficult to find seats. Some came as early as 6 p.m., leaving hats, scarfs and other objects by which they might "reserve" the seats. The program marked the last meeting of the Tokyo Women's club this year. The first meeting of the new year is to be held on January 14. The club's library will be open Thursday afternoon for the last time before the holidays.

Hergesheimer, Sick of Novels, Goes on Cruise

Finishes Book On A Nice, Strapping, Non-Neurotic Pennsylvania Cowgirl

Joseph Hergesheimer, novelist, departed recently on a vacation cruise to Bermuda and Nassau aboard the Swedish-American liner Gripsholm. Before sailing from New York Mr. Hergesheimer received interviewers in his stateroom and cheerily announced (a) that he was heartily sick of all novels, including his own, (b) that he was probably through with novel writing, and (c) that some time after he gets back he hopes to hunt up a newspaper job for himself, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

"I'm going to have a grand time," Mr. Hergesheimer assured his visitors. "In this trip, I mean. I'm going to wear old insuling clothes. No engine-turned American dinner jackets for me. And no formal cocktail parties with Mr. Jones or Mrs. Brown before dinner. I'm going to sit in the smokestack, if necessary, and wear an old sweater and duck pants, and loaf around in the sun.

"I earned this rest. I've just finished a book, 'Memeter.' It's about a fine, string, strapping cowgirl in Pennsylvania. (I'm done writing about the South. Let the Southerners write their own books from now on. I'm going to write about my own state of Pennsylvania.) This girl is a great, big, smacking, nice kind of girl, strong and elemental and healthy and able to work outdoors.

"You understand it's a direct crack at the highly developed, metallic, neurotic, modern women who hang around the Ritz and sit up at the bars. It ought to be quite a surprise to what Henry Mencken used to call 'our customers.'

Finds Newspapers Fascinating

"It always surprises me when you fellows call, because people like us really give you no news. We're too dull. Our little lives are unimportant. But newspapers fascinate me. I'm one of the few writers who never worked on a newspaper. Some time this winter I think I'll go out and hunt me up a newspaper job. I'd like to get a column to run on a metropolitan paper. Not daily. That would be presumptuous and boring.

"I'd like to take light, bitter slaps at the world and the slop Americans swallow. Just think of the cocktails some people serve—made up of sawdust and melted ice, mixed in a shaker as tall as a cathedral and allowed to set around for hours on the piano before people get to them. Then, there's literature and writing, nature fakers and stupid novels to take apart.

"What we want is a new form—something vital, amusing and alive—immediately in the present, something truly in the American idiom.

"All esthetic questions are dead and boresome. Music, art and the rest—they're not important to us any more. I've been associated with foney letters a long time and I'm sick of them. And if I am, the readers must be. I'm too old to be readily fooled, but not too old to try for something new and better.

"I wish you'd read a book called 'Calico Shoes,' by James T. Farrell. Read it and tell me all about it the next time I see you. Give me the real dope on it. It may be a very good book. It's natural writing, what a bunch of tough babies in Chicago really do and say and think. That's one way for Americans to write. All good books are provincial. That's why I didn't care for George Moore. And I don't care about Matisse or anything else so far removed from our lives. I want to know what the girl in the corner drug store is saying. I can't read 'Alice in Wonderland' or anything like that—I have no sense of fantasy."

Mr. Hergesheimer efficiently unbuttoned and rebuttoned the coat of his dark gray flannel double-breasted suit, and fussed with his gay red and buff print tie. He looked around his cabin approvingly.

Affrighted at Hollywood

"I think I'll like this," he mussed. "You know, they wanted me to take a world cruise, and sent me a lot of literature. That was what ruined it all, when they sent me a folder saying I'd have a week in Jerusalem and one day in Hollywood. I couldn't face it. I can't see how Henry (Mencken) likes those long cruises. He took to them just like a tourist. Must have been his marriage, eh?

"I won't do a bit of writing on this trip. I write in long hand. This last book of mine is 60,000 words long. I can write a long book in thirty days—I have to watch it or I'd write too damn many. My secretary types the manuscript out for me. Every writer needs a secretary with brains, for all writers are dumbbells. It must be that to have the ability to write an imaginative book a man must lack some other abilities.

"All creative ability is divorced from the head. I don't know where it centers, but brains aren't the answer. One of us writes a scholarly book on grammar, and then some girl secretary has to set to work and unknit his sentences. My secretary has a fine brain, so she gets $30 a week, and I get a little more than that, most of the time. Well, let's end that right there and talk privately a while, shall we?"

Mrs. Vanderbilt Loses Custody Of Daughter

Mrs. Whitney and Mrs. Vanderbilt in turn, will displace the former Vanderbilt nurse, Mrs. Emma Sullivan Keislich, who was discharged by Mrs. Vanderbilt for taking the child to Mrs. Whitney and was immediately hired by Mrs. Whitney to stay with the child. The nurse testified against Mrs. Vanderbilt after the transfer of the child had led to the court action.

The remainder of the decision gave details for carrying it out. The girl's week-ends with her mother are not to start until a month has elapsed. A week-end is to begin at 10 a.m. Saturday and to end at sundown on Sunday.

Mrs. Whitney is to keep the child at other times in her country home in Old Westbury, L. I., and to continue sending her to the Greenvale School at Roslyn, which she has attended for two years. The child is not to be taken out of the State.

Statement by Mrs. Whitney

After the decision Mrs. Whitney received reporters at her home at 871 Fifth Avenue and distributed a typewritten statement, as follows:

"My only thought since little Gloria came to live with me and throughout the court proceeding has been for the child's welfare. Her health, her happiness and what was best for her have been my only interest.

"It was always my hope and my desire to bring the child and her mother closer together. My house was open to Mrs. Vanderbilt at all times. She could come and be with Gloria whenever she wanted.

"This case was not of my making. The papers were served on me. The last thing I wanted was a court proceeding.

"I am sure you all love and understand children, and I want to appeal to you in behalf of this little girl. She is the chief person in this case through no fault of her own. I appeal to you to put this case out of the public mind. I am sure you agree with me that the less said about the proceeding the better for the sake of the child.

"I want to tell you all how very happy I am that Justice Carew has seen fit to give me this great responsibility. I accept it very seriously and shall do everything in my power to be worthy of his confidence in me."

Although Mrs. Whitney was willig to entertain all supplementary questions, her answers to most of them were that she would "abide by any wish the court may express" and that "everything will be done in the interest of the child."

She declined, however, to change the tense in her prepared statement from "was" to "is" where she had written that "it was my desire to bring the child and her mother closer together" and also "My house was open to Mrs. Vanderbilt at all times; she could come and be with Gloria whenever she wanted."

Would Forget Antagonisms

When she was pressed as to her idea of her future relations with Mrs. Vanderbilt under this court order, she said at last: "I hope if there has been any antagonism it will be forgotten in the interest of the child."

One of her answers was that she thought the decision was "a fair one." She was asked how she thought Mrs. Vanderbilt would feel about losing her child under such circumstances. She thought a while and answered slowly, "I have no idea."

Another question which caused Mrs. Whitney to pause awhile was: "What will you do when you attempt to deliver the child to Mrs. Vanderbilt for the first week-end, if the child has another nervous frenzy, as she did when her mother atempted to visit her at your home while this case was going on?"

"I will have to face that situation," Mrs. Whitney said, "when it comes up."

Mrs. Whitney said her attorneys had not yet explained to her just what the decision meant in detail and what part in its enforcement had been assigned by Justice Carew to the child's property guardians, George W. Wickersham and Thomas E. Bilchrist, in making them parties to the decision.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The German War Chest

Before 1914, Germany was the only country in Europe to keep a war chest. It was established in 1871 when defeated France paid Germany an indemnity of $1,000,000,000. Out of that sum the Berlin Government set aside 120,000,000 Marks ($30,000,000) in gold coins, to be kept in the Julius Tower of the ancient citadel of Spandau, near Berlin as a war chest.

On July 3, 1913 the war chest was increased by another 240,000,000 Marks ($60,000,000) in gold, so that the total of the chest amounted to $90,000,000 at the outbreak of the World War.

The War cost Germany an average of $28,000,000 a day, so that the Chest was just sufficient for 3 days. But in keeping the treasure unproductive, Germany lost about $11,000,000 in interest, between 1871 and May 27, 1919 when the gold was finally turned over to the Reichsbank.

Soviet Now Turns To Fine Manners

should know how to dance.

The fox trot and other modern Western dances, which only a few years ago were considered in Soviet Russia so bourgeois as to be positively sinful, are now being taken up by Soviet youth with the earnestness with which they attack everything from subway building to parachute jumping. And, of course, there is a Socialist angle to it.

There is a dance studio, usually crowded, in the Park of Culture and Rest, where the director is using the fox trot, tango and waltz as a basis on which to devise new Socialist steps expressing the life and psychology of the new Russia.

"The new dancing will be uniform," he said. "Once learned, any dancer will be able to dance as well with one partner as another because everybody's steps will always be the same."

Modern dancing is only one of the many movements toward cultural niceties which Soviet authorities are openly encouraging. White collars and neckties have been de rigueur for some time, unfortunately displacing the picturesque and comfortable belted tunics. And now that it has been demonstrated that clean white collars can with propriety cover an orthodox proletarian neck, there is a drive for shaving.

Commissar Is Strict

Recently D. K. Ordjonikidze, Commissar for Heavy Industry, refused an audience to an official who had come all the way from Siberia and who rushed into his presence from a train to report, without first removing a two-day growth of beard. M. Ordjonikidze received him two hours later when he appeared shaved with his hair combed and a fresh shoeshine. Recently the commissar devoted much of a speech to a conference of industrial leaders on the desirability of Soviet engineers shaving daily and being neatly dressed.

Clean hands also are in style now, and one sees the fingernails of many Soviet girls tinted with lacquer made by the Soviet Cosmetic Trust. A writer in the newspaper Izvestia a few days ago proposed a new code of proletarian "good tone." He gives the following commandments:

Don't champ your teeth when eating. Don't pick your feeth with your fingernails. Offer your seat in street cars, waiting rooms, etc., to women and invalids. Help old people to cross streets where traffic is dense. Don't eat off your knife. Wash your hands before meals. Shave daily.

Musical Play: "Chorus Of A Million"

popularity as a singer, Minami becomes despondent. However, he finds consolation in Haruko's sympathy which somewhat alleviates his low spirit. Their love grows deeper and he finally proposes. Haruko calmly prefers to dream the happy lover's dream and turns down his proposal.

One evening Minami and Haruko ask Tayama to join a little banquet to celebrate one of Tayama's recent successful radio broadcasts. Notwithstanding his promise to accept the invitation Tayama attends a party given by the Bachelor Girls Club.

Haruko's sympathy for Minami continues. She finally consents to Minami's proposal of marriage. They seek Tomiko's (Haruko's elder sister) permission to marry, but she objects because Minami has no visible means of supporting a family. Tomiko strongly urges Minami to attain success before considering marriage.

Minami is disapointied and mysterously disappears. At the same time Haruko also disappears. By a coincidence Minami and Haruko happened to be on the same coastal steamer and are brought back by Miko.

Severe Winter To Provide Test Of Nazi Regime

Though Unemployment Is Down, Lack Of Goods And Money Creates Hardships

The greatest test to which the Nazi regime of Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler has been subjected will be its ability to lead Germany safely through the coming winter, which promisses to be the most severe this country has been since the war, says the Berlin corespondent of the New York Herald Tribune whose article follows. The unemployment problem, on paper at least, is not so huge as it was during the deflation days of former Chancellor Heinrich Bruening, when more than 6,000,000 were drawing "doles." Now this total has been reduced to 2,250,000.

This achievement has been accomplished in part by a credit inflation that has brought a marked boom in the home market, and in part by imposing sacrifices on employers and labor. Firms have been in many cases, forced to take on more men where there was no economic justification for such a policy, and workers have, in many instances, been compelled to toil less hours and receive less pay so that more men could receive employment.

Germany's economic difficulties today are largely caused by the scarcity of her currency reserves and the resultant shortage of raw materials, because of her inability to pay for foreign goods. Nominal wages have remained intact in Germany, but real wages have perceptibly declined. For this the economic policy of the Nazi government, which has chosen to sacrifice city workers for the peasants, is responsible.

The aim of the Hitler regime has been to make the Reich self-supporting so far as foodstuffs are concerned so that in the next war Germany cannot be starved into submission by a naval blockade, as in the World War. For this purpose farming has been artificially stimulated, partly by fixing the prices of grains, and partly by imposing high tariff rates on foreign farm products which safeguard the home market for the efficient German peasants.

Food Prices Soar

As a direct consequence of the agrarian policy of Walter Darre, Minister of Agriculture, food and agricullural prices have soared about 24 per cent compared with what they were in the spring of 1933, while potatoes have risen 85 per cent, vegetables 30 per cent and pork 11 per cent.

These increases in the cost of living have led to much grumbling and discontent which, of course, under Nazi censorship is not reflected in the press or from the public platform. Occasionally these grievances find vent, as in the demonstration of the Nazi "Old Guard" against Paul Joseph Goebbels at Friedrichsheim recently.

Nazis Try to Cover Conditions

Sometimes the Nazis seek to divert popular dissatisfaction over Hitler's failure to lead the German people into the paradise he promised them, just as the Russia of the Czars used to instigate the masses to pogroms against the Jews in order to make them forget their complaints against the imperial regime. Thus the Nazi "Der Angriff" openly incited the proletarians of Berlin recently to riot against the Reichsbank official who had evicted tenants, and similar demonstrations have been encouraged against hoarders and profiteers, which certainly do not enhance respect for the law.

But the most statesmanlike step was the appointment of Dr. Karl Goerdeler to renew the job he once held under Bruening as price dictator. Dr. Goerdeler, who succeeded in reducing the cost of living 10 per cent in the winter ten years ago, has started bravely by declaring that no prices shall be fixed without his consent, and by defying Darre with a ruling that minimum prices must be reduced.

Wants to Barter on Trade

Meanwhile, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, virtual economic dictator of Germany, is throttling imports to bare necessities and denouncing treaties with the object of replacing them with agreements on a barter basis. Germany, he says, in the future must buy only from countries that buy from her, and only in such quantities as they buy "Ersatz," substitute goods which are being brought into German markets.

Germans, for instance, think they have produced in vista an adequate substitute for woolens, and Dr. Schacht has forced a leading industrial corps into an association for the production of petroleum from lignite.

Renew "Winter Relief"

As an additional means of tiding the nation over another bitter winter, the Nazis have adopted the scheme of "winter relief," introduced with great success last year. One Sunday a month all Germans are expected to dine on a single course, and the resultant economies flow to the funds for feeding and clothing the poor. The Brown Shirts collect money from door to door, and the half-hearted citizen who does not reach into his pockets is likely to find himself speedily enjoying an unenviable notoriety.

This "winter relief campaign" is perhaps the best organized of all national charities, and reflects great credit on the Nazi movement. Last year, according to figures issued by Dr. Goebbels, nearly 17,000,000 citizens received aid from those funds, which amounted to more than 584,000,000 marks in cash and about 174,000,000 marks worth of goods.

Poland Bargains To Increase Trade

Hopes To Sell More To Britain In Exchange For Larger Imports Of English Autos

Barter is now the established practice of the Polish Government in dealings with foreign countries, says Jerzy Szapiro in the New York Times. Poland is engaged in trade negotiations with several countries and compensation will certainly form the basis of most agreements as in the recently signed convention with Germany.

The most important conversations in progress are those with Great Britain, the largest foreign consumer of Polish goods. Britain is said to be ready to maintain the present quotas for Polish farm products and even raise them if the Poles take more British manufactured goods. Britain especially hopes to sell large quantities of automobiles here.

Poland with a population of 33,000,000 owns about 30,000 automobiles. She is far behind Rumania and Greece. The number of cars has steadily fallen since 1929. With excessive taxes and prohibitive customs duties an automobile has become a luxury.

A man must be wealthy to have a simple Ford, costing here about $2,000. The roads are bad, so a car's life is shorter here than elsewhere. Gasoline is 50 cents a gallon, although Poland is an oil-producing country.

Attempts to establish a Polish automobile industry failed completely. The army engineering department bought Italian parts and assembled them with Polish bodies. This car was expensive and not very good.

Horse-drawn cabs and carriages, which were beginning to disappear from Warsaw streets, are increasing and will soon outnumber the automobile tagicabs. On the highways the horse again is the undisputed master.

The motorists' demands for cheap cars, supported by the entire press and the business world, were not heard until army experts became alarmed. The army needs cars and trucks in war. Poland's two powerful neighbors, Russia and Germany, are making great progress in road building and automobile producting. Poland, without good roads and automobiles, is greatly handicapped.

Having failed to create their own motor industry with Italian help, the Poles are now ready to change their policies. Customs duties are expected to be considerably lowered in the Spring, if not altogether abolished for a period.

Anticipating this change, Germany tried to obtain quotas on automobiles in the recent barter agreement, but the Poles excluded them. They want to keep their strongest trump card for bargains with France, Britain and the United States. This card has already been skillfully played in parleys with Britain.

Some manufacturers are said to be ready to lend money for road building. American firms have offered loans in exchange for increased automobile imports.

Conductor Misses Train, It Goes Back To Get Him

CRESTON, Iowa, Nov. 23—Passengers on the eastbound Chicago, Burlington & Quincy morning train felt a mild uneasiness today when the flier, after speeding toward Chicago out of Creston to make up a slight schedule delay, suddenly went into reverse nine miles away at Afton and shuttled back again.

The brakeman put their minds at ease. "We just discovered," he said, that the conductor missed the train."

Separated From Goose, Gander Cuts His Throat

CAMBRIDGE, Md., Nov. 20,—Colonel Albanus Phillips's prize Canadian decoy gander has committed suicide—the victim of a jealous rage. Colonel Phillips, as a result, ordered the toenails of each member of his decoy flock closely trimmed today, says the New York Herald Tribune.

Hunting associates of the veteran Cambridge sportsman returned today from his lodge in Blodsworth Island, thirty miles south of this town, with a strange tale of how the prize Canadian became separated from his mate and discovered that flock attendants had placed her with another and less important gander.

Throughout the morning the big fellow was in a surly mood. He strained at his anchor chain frantically as the hunters filled their bags Finally, unable to gain his freedom, he slashed his throat so severely with his keen talons that merciful attendants completed the killing.

52 Pen Drawings By Noel Nouet Being Published

Album Contains Preface By Ikuma Arishima And Poem By Claudel

An album containing 52 pen drawings by N. Noel Nouet, well-known French poet and professor of the Tokyo School of Foreign Languages, Hosei University, and the Military College, will be reproduced and published by the Japan Times and Mail shortly. It is entitled "Tokyo Seen By A Foreigner" or "Tokyo vue par un etranger."

It contains black and white pen drawings depicting scenic views of the capital, which were drawn during the past three years. Some of them were reproduced in the Sunday edition of the Japan Times.

These drawings show, noted places in modern Tokyo, others depict old castles, ancient moats, temples, pagodas, parks, principal department stores, newly constructed bridges, buildings, railway stations, and historic monuments. These subjects were well chosen by the poet with his artistic appreciation and keen mind.

Game To Japan In 1926

M. Noel Nouet come to Japan in 1926 and since then has taught the French language. He likes to take walks, carrying with him his pen and sketchbook whenever he has a spare moment. As with great French writers and poets, such as Victor Hugo, Balzac, Anatole France, Rene Beylesxe, Maupassant, Paul Bourget and Leon Daudet, M. Nouet strolls almost daily along the boulevards and streets of the capital. When he is touched by some beautiful scene, he takes out the favorite fountain pen with which he used to compose poems in the past, and rapidly makes a sketch of the site.

Poet Ambassador

M. Paul Claudel, great French poet ambassador composed several fascinating poems of the old castle when he was here in Tokyo, about ten years ago, and M. Nouet makes sketches by which he describes his impressions. More than one hundred sketches were made in his years in Japan. As with Jules Romains, contemporary French poet and novelist, M. Nouet appreciates the life of the modern city but at the same time he has a poetic appreciation of Hiroshige, great painter of the Ukiyoye School.

To afford perfect reproductions of these drawings, the editor of this album has chosen pure Japanese hand made paper and paid great attention to the printing. All the drawings have captions in both English and French. Mr. Ikuma Arishima, outstanding oil painter and member of the Nika Art society has written a preface for the album and one of the finest poems to Tokyo by Paul Claudel is also printed in it. Furthermore, M. Nouet has written a special article stressing the evolution of the modern capital of the Empire.

The album has much artistic value and is very suitable as a Christmas gift and souvenir of Tokyo. It is being displayed at leading bookstores in Tokyo. The office of the Japan Times will receive applications. The album is 8 x 11 inches and the price is two yen.

Exhibition of Originals

On the occasion of the publication of the album, an exhibition of the original drawings will be held at the Seiju-sha Art Galleries, located next to the Hattori Building at Owaricho Crosing on the Ginza, Tokyo, from December 24 to 26. The gallery will be open from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m. each day, and some 70 drawings will be on display.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Dwarfing The Gargantuan

In describing the incredible eating capacity of Edicoe Needless of Detroit, Mich. who is a railroad laborer by profession and an eating champion by inclination, I am afraid that I should in vain exhaust all the superlatives of the dictionary.

Over 6 feet in height and weighing about 210 pounds, his prowess at the table simply staggers the imagination. He can pack away 60 large pork chops, and 25 peach and blueberry pies at a single sitting, washing it down with 48 bottles of assorted soft drinks. In one average meal, he will consume a quantity of meal equal to the normal weekly needs of a family of 5. He almost ate a restaurant out of business.

On Sundays when he has a day off, he concentrates on fowl instead of pork chops and will then consume about 15 chickens in a single meal. For Thanksgiving he once consumed 3 turkeys aggregating 60 pounds. He has achievements such as eating 24 pounds of cheese within 30 minutes, and 300 raw eggs at one sitting, to his credit.

But all this is nothing to what Needless used to eat, according to his own confession made in a luncheon interval. He doesen't intend to get married, as food is his only "consuming" passion. His 3 meals a day aggregate 45 large pork steaks, 60 pork chops, a peck of fried potatoes, 10 cups of black coffee, about 100 bottles of soft drinks and beer and 50 pies.

Tannic Acid Spray Gun Saves Victims Of Burns

CHICAGO, Nov. 23—Skilled mechanic among Chicago's firemen have developed a new device for emergency treatment of flame victims—a spray gun for saturating burns with tannic acid, they revealed today, says the New York Herald Tribune.

Tannic acid treatment of burns is one of the newest developments of modern medicine, although the Chinese are reported anciently to have used the same idea. The acid, applied to burned areas, unites with the serum and forms a protective crust over the wound, barring infection, and also counterating shock.

Where once hope was abandoned for patients burned over a third of the body area, it is now possible to save life even though as much as half the skin surface is destroyed.

CHRISTMAS AT ST PAUL'S

The annual Christmas festival service at St. Paul's University will be held at 7 p.m. Saturday in the University Chapel, the last day before the student body disperses for the Christmas and year-end holidays. This year for the second time a choral pageant of the Nativity will be introduced into the service. With the aid of forty choir boys, ten acolytes and a cast of ten the drama of the Birth of Christ at Bethlehem will be enacted instead of the usual sermon.

Immediately following the processional hymn, "While Shepherds Watched Their Flocks by Night" and the Choir, academic procession and priests have reached their places in the chancel and sanctuary, the choir and congregation will sing the Te Deum, during which approximately one hundred students who have been baptised during the first two terms of the present school year will approach the chancel steps and light tall candles. The regular Order for Evensong will follow with Versicles, Responses, Nunc Dimittis and Creedo all chanted. During the Offertory the choir boys will sing three Carols seldom heard in Japan. The first will be "Lo, how a Rose e'er blooming," a 13th century carol by Paretorius, translated into Japanese. The second, an old French carol, "Les anges dans nos campagnes" will be sung in Japanese and the third, a 17th century English carol, "Christmas Hymn" will be sung in English. The Offertory Chant follows.

After the Offertory Chant, the Chaplain of the University, the Rev. Dr. Takaharu Takamatsu, will relate from the pulpit, the prologue of the Nativity scene at Bethlehem, telling of the appearance of the Angel Gabriel to the Shepherds on the hillside outside of Bethlehem, and also of the start of the Shepherds and Kings to Place of Christ's Birth. During this prologue the servers will be setting the Nativity scene behind a gold screen. As the prologue draws to a close outside the Chapel will be heard the voices of Shepherds in swelling chorus, approaching singing "The First Noel". Immediately upon the completion of the prologue the screen will be removed revealing the scene of the Nativity at Bethlehem in the choir chancel. The setting will show the Inn-stable, a cattle shed with thatched roof. In the center stands a "cradle" for fodder, above which hangs a canopy rudely constructed of a cloak thrown over a traveller's staff thrust into the eaves of the thatch. Above the roof is a bright star. The Virgin reclines in the "cradle", with the Child concealed beneath her robe. Joseph sits near by. Mrs. Hisako Kaneko, wife of Professor H. Kaneko will take the part of the Virgin. Mr. Seitaro Koizumi plays the role of Joseph. Immediately after the opening lines comes the "Ave Maria" sung in Latin by the Choir.

The shepherds, seven played by Messrs. M. Hasegawa, Kazuho Oda, Shimpei Suzuki, Yoshinosuke Suzuki, Sadakatsu Kubota, Isamu Watanabe and Kenji Kirasawa, will approach the scene from the rear of the Chapel chanting, "O, Come, All Ye Faithful". After their arrival and upon the greeting of the Virgin, Choir and Shepherds will be heard singing the "Ave Maria".

After a short exhortation by the Virgin, Mrs. George Marshall will be heard in a soprano solo singing Wright's "What Child is This," following which the seven shepherds will present their gifts of bread, milk, cheese, nuts and wine and a Lamb to the Holy Child, and the seventh Shepherd will offer his song as his gift to the Child. Then will be heard the approach of the Three Kings chanting "We Three Kings of the Orient Are". On their arrival at the Nativity scene, they will in turn present their offerings of Godl, frankincense and myrrh, after which the choir, shepherds and Kings will sing, "O, Come, All Ye Faithful". One of the Kings will then petition the Virgin for the Blessing of the Holy Child during which a litany will be sung, "O, Come, O, Come, Emmaneul". Mary will then relate the significance of Christ's Birth during which all will sing "Ave Maria". The choir and congregation will then chant the Christmas collect after which the Virgin will conclude her exhortation.

The closing prayers will then be said by Dr. Takamatsu before the Nativity scene, after which Holy Night will be sung as a Vesper hymn. Dr. Takamatsu will then pronounce the Benediction and "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing" will conclude the service as the recessional hymn.

Friends of the University are invited to attend the Service but are kindly asked to be in their seats before 7 p.m.

The Middle School Christmas service will be held in the Chapel at 2 p.m. Monday which is the final day of the Middle School term.

Hapag-Lloyd Shifts Vessels To Other Lines

Germany Reorganizing Va. Minor Services, Threatens British South Sea Control

Following the recent announcement of the reorganization of German shipping involving the decentralization of various services, the Hamburg-American (Hapag) Line-North German Lloyd management announced recently that several vessels formerly operated by them were being transferred to other lines.

To the Hamburg South American Line, which operates from Hamburg and other European ports to Brazil and the Argentine, the Hamburg-American Line has delivered the steamships Eurpatoria and General Osorio, while the General Artigas, General San Martin, Amassia, Eifel, Georgia, Hohenstein, Paraguay, Taunus, Uruguay and Westerwald will be turned over at a later date.

The North German Lloyd has delivered to the same service the steamship Sierra Nevada and is planning to transfer the steamships Alrich, Berengar, Holstein, Raport, Grandon, Ludwigshafen, Madrid, Munester and Sierra Salvada.

Woermann Line Gets Ships

The Woermann Line, operating several services in the African trade, including the western and eastern routes around Africa and calls at South African ports will receive the steamships Ilmar, Ingo, Tuebingen, Wigbert and Wolfrom from the North German Lloyd.

According to advices from Berlin the German shipping companies trading with Africa have decided on a general reduction in freight rates. In the case of those lines operating to East African ports the so-called additional currency charge of 10 per cent has been cencelled.

The Levante Line, operating to the Near East and as far as Batoum on the Black Sea, will augment its present fleet with the former North German Lloyd liners Akka, Alaya, Alimnia, Amsel, Angora, Aquila, Arta, Atto, Avola, Cavlia, Nienburg Smyrna, Star, Ulm and Winfried.

Information has just been received at the local offices of the Hamburg-American-Lloyd combine that the service formerly operated by the Lloyd between Australia and China will be resumed with the sailing of the motorship Neptune from Sydney on December 5 and from Hongkong on December 31. The passage between the two ports will require twenty-two days. In March the motorship Mekur will enter that service. The two vessels thereafter will mainain a monthly schedule, sailing from Sydney, Salamaua, Rabaul, Sandakan and Manila to Hongkong. On the return trips to Australia, they will call at one or more ports in the Philippines, at Sandakan Rabaul, Salamaua, Tulagi and Melbourne.

Both ships are of 6,000 gross tons and have been renovated and redecorated. They are equipped to carry eighty-four first-class and twenty third-class passengers. In reconditioning the Neptun and Merkur, particular attention was paid to making them suitable for travel in the tropics; special ventilating system, as well as a built-in outdoor swimming pool, has been installed.

British Protest Competition

The new German competition has aroused a storm of protest from British ship lines now serving the territory and representatives of the Eastern and Australian Steamship Company, the Orient Line, Burns, Philip & Co., and W. R. Carpenter, Ltd., in Australia have urged that immediate steps be taken by Australia, Great Britain and other Dominions to deal with the latest threat to British shipping.

Life Prolonged By A Chemical, Says Professor

Tells Scientists At Cleveland Sodium Rhodanate Increases Resistance To Disease

An assertion that a simple rose-colored chemical, known as sodium rhodanate, would increase resistance to disease and prolong life was made at Cleveland recently before the meeting of the National Academy of Sciences by Professor Wilder D. Bancroft and his reasearch associates in the chemistry department of Cornell University, says the New York Times.

Sodium rhodanate, a chemical composed of one atom each of sodium, sulphur and nitrogen, postpones old age in chickens and in rabbits and has given them a much greater resistance to the typical diseases of their species, Dr. Bancroft maintained. The chemical acted, he states, by preventing the hardening of nerve and brain tissue and of other substances in the body known as colloids.

Professor Bancroft's statements were discussed from the floor with evident skepticism by some of the scientists present. Dr. Bancroft, in turn, issued a challenge to the medical profession to make use of his discovery, instead of scoffing at it, and criticized the profession in strong language for having so far failed to carry on independent experiments, which, he said he felt certain, would collaborate the findings by himself and his co-workers at Cornell University.

Called Aid to Longer Life

"These preliminary results," Dr. Bancroft stated, "indicate that sodium rhodanate improves the general health, and lessens the nervous irritability of rabbits and chickens and increases their resistance to respiratory infections, infectious leukemia and possibly a number of other diseases.

"Of even more interest to us are the general conclusions which we believe we are justified in drawing from these experiments and from our preceding work."

In the last twenty-five years, Dr. Bancroft said, the probable length of human life has increased materially, but the change has been due largely to a decrease in mortality among infants and children. The probable length of life of a man of 45 had not been increased appreciably in the last quarter century.

"The colloid chemist comes in where the medical man drops out. Sodium rhodanate and drugs of that type will minimize the physical effects of worry and will decrease the tendency to nervous breakdowns not caused by definite pathological (disease) conditions.

"Sodium rhodanate increase the resistance of the living organism to infection by inducing better health. Drugs of this type will not cure progressive lesions and sclerotic (or hardening) conditions; but they will retard the ageing of the colloids (finely divided parts) of the body and will thereby delay the onset of such pathological conditions.

"If every human being of 45 or over, for whom sodium rhodanate is not contra-indicated, would take it regularly for the rest of his life, we predict an averase increase in the probable length of life of at least two years, provided the medical men will cooperate.

"The medical profession, as a whole, is hostile to us, due to the attitude of those who should be the leaders. So far as we know, not a single medical school or hospital has shown any active, intelligent interest in our work.

"Our answer to the medical profession is simple. It is up to them to clean house. From now on it is a fight to the finish between the medical profession and ourselves. There can be only one outcome to this contest. The medical profession will lose.

"The medical profession, or their unwise leaders, can ,and probably will, retard progress; but they cannot prevent progress completely.

Challenge Medical Profession

"We challenge the medical profession to make their tests of our treatment, with all experimental details released, on certain forms of alcoholism, insomnia and sciatica. These are selected because even a medical man should get good results the first time. The medical profession does not dare make these tests, because the results would show that we are right."

Dr. Bancroft stated that about 100 persons were now experimenting on themselves with sodium rhodanate and that he himself had been taking it for insomina and for counteracing the effects of coffee at night. He took one teaspoonful of a 11 per cent solution once a week.

Dr. A. J. Carlson of the University of Chicago took issue with Dr. Bancroft.

"The prolongation of mere existence by itself," Dr. Carlson said, "is not enough. There are plenty of those who are dead and don't know it. With some of us the problem should be an easy way of easing us out."

Professor H. C. Sherman of Columbia University reported on results of further experiment with special diets for rats, which, he said, show that certain vitamins and minerals added to the diet would increase longevity by about 10 per cent. He first reported on these experiments last year in Chicago.

The diet, rich in calcium, Vitamins A and G, and in proteins, Dr. Sherman said, not only gave the rats a life longer by 10 per cent than the average, but also increased their rate of growth. Other experiments refuted the contention that speeding up the rate of growth decreased the length of life of rats.

Millions Vanish In Lack of Work By 354 Women

Expenditures For Home Hit Hardest Through Idleness Of High Salaried Workers

More than a million dollars failed to reach the cash registers of business enterprises in New York City through the enforced idleness of 354 women workers according to the survey of white collar employment just completed by the American Woman's Association, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The survey was made under grants from the Carnegie Corporation of New York and the Daniel and Florence Guggenheim Foundation for the purpose of securing authentic information about the effects of the economic depression on this group of women workers about which little authentic information is available. Some 1,350 members engaged in businesses and professions co-operation in making the study.

The average period of unemployment was sixteen months, a total of 5,568 months or 464 years for the entire group. The average income normally earned by the members of the group was $2,415. This, multiplied by the 464 years of unemployment gives a loss of $1,120,560 to business because 354 workers capable of earning a salary considerably better than the average were deprived of their accustomed earnings through unemployment

Of the 1,350 women filling out the questionnaire more than 60 per cent or 510, of those who had retained their jobs had suffered cuts in salary. The average amount of the reduction in earnings was $630. In one year, therefore, one city lost $321,300 worth of business from this single source.

Drastic Cuts Made

Even these two figures combined, $1,441,860, do not cover the entire cost to business of the economic adjustments forced upon this group of normally good spenders by the collapse of the economic system. For whereas 60.5 per cent reported reductions in salaries, 98 per cent, or virtually the entire number, declared they had made drastic cuts in their budgets. Almost a fourth had cut their budgets in half. One-half had made reductions of 40 per cent or more.

Nearly half these able and independent women feel the fact that they were supporting, or helping to support, one or more other persons. Some who set themselves down as the sole support of an aging or invalided mother or father, were giving occasional lifts to sister or brothers, nieces or nephews besides. On the average, the number of dependents to each woman who answered the question was 2.4. In 1931, when the association made its first economic survey of its membership, the figure was only 1.9.

Appearance Outlay Pared

In the face of women's traditional love of adornment, and despite the very keen appreciation of this special group of the importance of clothes and grooming to business success, 82 per cent reported that they had cut down on the amounts they had formerly spent on their appearance. The average amount of the cut was 34 per cent, considerably more than one-fourth of what they formerly spent in the department store, the dress or specialty shop, and the beauty shop. Next came travel. The railroads and steamships, the hotels, wayside inns, travel bureaus, motor service stations that used to profit so largely from the rovings of the globe-trotting teachers and business women on vacation, were cut down almost one-fourth. Theaters, concerts, movies—amusements of all kinds—suffered to practically the same degree, 24.4 per cent.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Footprints of the Last Stand

The famous "Skipsea Footings" are located in a corner of a meadow off the Skipsea-Beeford Road, Yorkshire, England, and are believed to be the last footholds of 2 Danish soldiers who, in 1689, agreed to stand in them and fight a mortal battle with swords. One was killed in the battle and the slayer died at the hand of the executioner. Ever since, the "Footings" have borne witness to the tragedy. Grass will not grow in the "Footings" and they are always there about 3 inches deep. Over the grave of the two soldiers in St. Mary's Church in Beverly nearby, there is a tablet recording their fate.

The Monument To A Lie

The Cross of Devizes, Wiltshire, England stands in the market place of that town and on the spot where on January 25, 1753 Ruth Pierce of Potterne in the Country falsely asserted that she had paid her share of the purchase price of a sack of wheat bought by her in partnership with three other women. When the other women denied that she had paid the money, Ruth exclaimed, "I wish I may drop down dead if I have not." She rashly repeated this awful invocation, when to the horror of the multitude she instantly fell down and expired. They found the money concealed in her hand.

CHAIRMAN APPOINTED

Mr. T. Osawa, M.H.P., executive trustee of Doshisha University, has been appointed chairman of the reception committee in Kyoto for the American Garden party which will visit Japan early next summer under the auspices of the Society for International Cultural Relations of which Count Aisuke Kabayama is chairman.

DIRECTORS ELECTED

The election of half the members of the board of Doshisha University was held lately. New directors will take their posts from April 1st 1935. The new directors are: Messrs. M. Kobayashi, president of The Electric Industry & Chemistry Co., N. Ando, president of The Yakuseki Nippo, Prof. K. Miyake, of Tokyo Imperial University Agriculture department, E. Nakamura, former member of the Diet, S. Shimomura, president of Daimaru Department Store, T. Osawa, member of the house of Peers, T. Minobe, president of the Meikosha, and Countess Masako Uchida, wife of former minister of Foreign Affairs.

ENTERTAINS GUEST

Professor Charles McLean Warren and Mrs. Warren of Doshisha University entertained Dr. David Brewer Eddy of the American Board. During Dr. Eddy's stay in Kyoto, December 1921, he met the members of the Japan Mission of the American Board as a family and in many groups at different times. Dr. Eddy also addressed the regular English prayer meeting which included many foreign residents besides the American Board group. At the University he went about on the campus and visited the Middle School, meeting many of the teachers and pupils.... giving them an inspiring message at the Christmas service with which they followed the close of the work of the term, just before they scattered for Christmas vacation. In his address Dr. Eddy stated: "In coming to Japan I passed twenty-two countries: seventeen in Europe and five in Asia. Five were kingdoms, three colonies, seven dictatorships, and only five were republics. All of these governments show the effect of depression. Each nation was gripped by fear of its neighbors. Nations are separated each other by depression and fear.....We are looking for the day when the higher level of life, the spirit of good will, the spirit of Christmas, will return.....I have seen only two kinds of people: first part was 'mine, mine, all for myself' type; the other was another kind of folk with the spirit of sharing, good will, the Spirit of Christmas. They are the one who will save the world from the fear and depression....The spirit of good will and sharing, the spirit of Christmas, should be the spirit of the Doshisha....." Acting President Hachiro Yuasa gave a tea to meet nine deans of the schools and colleges, and Mr. Zoku Kamiya, executive trustee and treasurer, at Doshisha Amherst Building. Dr. Eddy also visited the College of Commerce, the Woman's College, and the Girls' Academy. Miss Mary Florence Denton gave Dr. Eddy a No theatre party at Kanze theatre to which the following were invited: Miss Dorothy Brandon of Toronto, Mrs. Lucy Tappan Scott of California, Mr. and Mrs. Charles McLean Warren, Mr. Frank L. Huntley, and others.

have to readjust their lives within Germany itself, there seek new occupations, and train their youth for new callings either within the framework of life in Germany or by way of preparation for ultimate settlement in other lands."

Cooperating Agencies

Mr. Hyman reviewed extensively the collaboration of the J. D. C. with other relief agencies, pointing out that not only has it assisted Jewish committees, but that support had been given "to organizations like the Society of Friends, International Student Service, International Committee for Securing Employment for Refugee Professional Workers, Emergency Committee in Aid of Displaced German Scholars, Emergency Committee in Aid of Displaced Foreign Physicians, &c., and non-sectarian refugee national or district committees."

In concluding his review, Mr. Hyman wrote:

"This is an all too brief record of suffering of millions of our people. They look to us for sympathy, for understanding, for help.

"Some of us, like the officers of the committee, the men and women of its administrative staff and our European directors, realize only too well the magnitude of the disaster and the overwhelming scope of the problems with which so many Jewish communities across the sea are now contending. For years to come, their anguish and trials will call to us for alleviation and constructive aid.

pressure of unsolved problems of economic need, of unemployment, of unprotected disability and old age, of the want of proper food, clothing and shelter which are stirring millions of men everywhere to seek by some form of force that which reason does not seem clear enough and strong enough to give them.

"Until the nations which call themselves civilized leave off that highly disastrous form of war which is economic nationalism, they will not be able to make themselves secure against that final form of economic nationalism which manifests itself in war.

"In such a situation, wise men will not linger in their well-doing. To bring together and to reorganize a true family of nations is the outstanding human need of the time in which we live."

Buchan Cites Common Ties

Dr. Buchan expressed the view that too much had been said in the past about the similarity of Great Britain and America and not enough about the differences. Understandings of the heart and head were most easily achieved, he said, between two nations that were very different. For the future, he declared, it was more important to recognize the fact that Great Britain and America were different "in the things that do not matter least."

"But on an occasion like this," he continued, "we may neglect these points of difference and think of the points we have in common. There are three which seem to me the chief. In the first place, we both have the gift in the last resort of getting down to facts in a crisis.

"In ordinary times we invent theories and dogas and declare that they are the most important things on earth, but when a crisis comes all sentimentalities go by the board and we get down to stark realities. We strip off our fancy clothes and stand starkly in our shirts, facing the hostility of circumstances.

"Both of our countries have been going through a crisis. It seems to me that we have faced it not only with courage but with good humor and have revealed a wonderful kinship of spirit.

"The second point is that at the back of our heads we hold the same faith. In a world where disintegration is the fashionable creed we have the courage to be constructive. I do not think we shall ever be shaken out of our faith in a sane nationalism, an ordered liberty and a rational progress, causes in which the last battle has not been fought.

"A final point is that we have the same problem and purpose. Neither people has yet attained what the philosophers call complete integration. We have both great assets, and our business is not to increase them in bulk, but to organize them for the purpose of civilization. We have to produce quality out of quantity, to integrate ourselves and our possessions and to vindicate the power of the spirit of man."

execution of business operations.

"In responsible modern enterprise there is such a long interval between origination of additional undertakings and accomplishment, with so large outlays for labor and materials and so small a margin for profit or loss, that a feeling of freedom from the danger of unpredictable outside influences is necessary to release initiative. To give this feeling in many directions it will now require less in the way of reassurance than at any time since last Spring.

"Reasonable access to the money market for capital funds is one obvious form of encouragement that would undoubtedly have as good effect here as in England. While our new capital issues in October totaled $121,000,000, with 80 per cent for account of government agencies, new capital subscriptions in London were the equivalent of $129,000,000 with 76 per cent for private enterprise."

Lumber Orders Rise

A slight increase in orders and shipments from 1,299 lumber mills for the week ended Nov. 17 as compared with the previous week was reported in Washington on Nov. 23 by the National Manufacturers Association.

Production, however, was somewhat lower. Reports for the week showed production of 163,563,000 feet, shipments of 179,416,000 feet and orders of 174,301,000 feet. For the previous week production was given at 172,833,000 feet, shipments 176,296,000 feet and orders 170,990,000 feet.

A 17.2 per cent increase in the number of building permits issued in October was reported by the Labor Department.

A survey covering 766 cities also showed that the value of the buildings for which permits were issued increased 30 per cent in October when compared with September.

At the same time, the department reported that wholesale commodity prices increased slightly during the week ended Nov. 17. Prices then were 76.7 per cent of their 1926 average, compared with 76.6 per cent the previous week and 71.7 per cent the corresponding week of last year.

Canadians Ask Social System

Sir Robert Faulkner Presides Over Commission Of United Church

Transformation of the "unduly acquisitive" economic and social system to bring it into line with Christian teachings is urged in a report adopted at the recent convention of the General Council of the United Church in Canada, held in Kingston, Ont.

Sir Robert Faulkner, formerly president of the University of Toronto, presided over the commission rendering the report. Economic and social experts throughout the Dominion, as well as clergymen, took part in the work. More than a score of auxiliary groups, representative of a cross section of the population, contributed from different centers, says the Christian Science Monitor.

The United Church, formed in 1925, is an amalgamation of all the Methodist and Congregational Churches in Canada with the greater portion of the Presbyterian. At the convention of the General Council two years ago the commission was authorized, and later appointed by the Board of Evangelism and Social Service.

Wide Distribution

The report is being sent to all churches of this denomination, not as an edict, but "for the widest study, as being in substance a statement of the Christian attitude and approach to the economic question."

The inquiry was conducted under four heads:

"1. To ascertain what are the Christian standards and principles which affect or should govern the social order.

"2. To discover how far current acceptances in these fields are consistent with these principles.

"3. To inquire into the ways and means by which these principles may be applied to existing conditions.

"4 To define those particular measures which must form the first steps toward a social order in keeping with the mind of Christ."

The commission based its findings upon "belief in a righteous God ceaselessly working in the affairs of men to bring into being a moral order in society wherein He should reign and His will be done."

It was affirmed that "Jesus taught the supreme worth of human personality which is never to be treated merely as a means. Whatever does violence to it he condemned. He denounced relentlessly the unduly acquisitive spirit and the arrogant temper of those who used their power for selfish ends."

Christian Economy

The aim of the United Church was given as being "to help to interpenetrate our civilization with the Spirit of Christ, and to transform those agencies and institutions of society which are foreign to that spirit, to the end that Christian people may have the fullest opportunity for realizing the fullness of the Christian life and that others may come to the same."

The commission expressed itself as concerned not merely with finding a way out of the present emergency, but also with discovering better ways of life and the permanent elements in a social order which will make improbable the recurrence of such a crisis.

It points out that "The present form of society is itself the outcome of a historical process in which have mingled inventiveness and energy as well as folly and selfishness. It is itself ever undergoing change. And in both urban and rural industry the controlling power is gradually passing from the engineer or maker to the financier.

"Shortening of hours of labor has provided leisure time which affords opportunity for cultural pursuits in the lives of thousands in whom such interests have not previously been awakened."

Industry's Primary Aim

Thus, while acknowledging certain gains, it points out that the results of modern invention have presented a new phase—dire want in the midst of plenty. "Both in towns and rural areas people are compelled to live in dwellings which lack the ordinary conveniences of modern housing," the report states, "yet the material for building and the energy of builders are available in abundance.

"This diversion of industry from its primary purpose of human service has either introduced or accentuated several major disorders in our organization. Foremost of these evils is fear begotten of insecurity. The passing of the ownership of the tools of production into the hands of those who do not use them compels the wage earner to rely, not on his ability and willingness to work, but on his ability to sell his labor to someone who has the capital, without which production cannot continue."

The report goes on to point out discriminations which have resulted from trade union affiliation, the policies of executives over which the worker has no control and the caprices of foremen or managers, from which there is no appeal. It deals at some length with unemployment and the hardships it brings, especially when "even in times of average prosperity the wage earner's margin of savings is usually too small to make possible adequate provision against emergency or old age."

It points out that unemployment heightens economic difficulties in that those who are unemployed are also removed to a large extent from the ranks of consumers; that society has not recognized responsibility for anything more than relief, "which is no substitute for self-maintenance by work."

The church calls upon economic, social and political leadership to adopt measures to the end that these disasters will cease to be part of the routine of social history. "The church recognizes that such a determination calls for profound changes both in thought and practice, but the ever recurring need for repentance, which means a change of mind, is part of the message of the church," the report adds.

It deals very pointedly with the distribution of income. "The ownership of the means of production," it says, "has hitherto carried with it the power to determine the proportions in which the output shall be distributed. Vast accumulations of wealth on the one hand and inability to purchase the elements of sustenance on the other cannot be tolerated as legitimate in a Christian society.

"When this economic inequality is associated, as frequently happens, with a social code which stratifies society according to income or wealth, grave social disabilities complicate the economic injustice."

"Higher Interests"

Pursuit of "higher interests" becomes difficult, it believes, under these conditions. Then it turns the spotlight on one of the great differences between our industrial and political structures, as follows:

"The oligarchic control of industry, when so organized that the worker has no share in determining the condition of his work, is out of harmony with the democratic ideals of freedom which our political institutions are supposed to express. Closely allied to this is the hireling spirit; under present conditions there is too little incentive and opportunity afforded."

The commission finds a "widespread acceptance of certain attitudes, dispositions and beliefs which go to make up a philosophy of life in direct opposition to Christian standards."

Included in these are a false view of wealth, divorced from welfare, represented by money and securities which enable one to acquire purchasing power without making any contribution to the wealh of the world; which fosters avarice and with it various forms of gambling, such as lotteries, betting and speculation; a degraded view of property, as functionless ownership without responsibility, but which may be used as a means of securing domination; profit, which instead of indicating need, becomes the main objective and results in mighty aggregations of wealth wielding political power; and finally, unregulated competion for private gain.

Materialistic Outlook

"This attitude is frankly materialistic in its scale of values and its aims," the report continues. "Against a civilization thus debased the church must set herself in uncompromising opposition." It holds that Christianity has from the first upheld another ideal of life in which satisfaction is sought not in the abundance of things which one possesses, but in the perfecting of the spirit; that Christianity has never recognized any absolute or unconditional private ownership, insisting that all things belong to God for the good of His children; that every man holds all he has as a steward of God, not for private aggrandizement or indulgence, but in order that the largest measure of common welfare may be achieved.

The third problem, as to ways and means by which these principles may be applied to existing conditions, is dealt with at great length. They may be summed up by a paragraph under the heading, "Elements of Social Justice," as follows:

Stevens Crusade Grips Canadians

Ex-Minister's New Deal Plea Shares Front Pages With The Triumph Of Roosevelt

Echoes of the Old Deal debacle over the border competed for the ear of the Canadian public early in November with the loud and persistent call for a new deal in this country by their own Harry Stevens, who recently resigned as Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Bennett Cabinet says John McCormac in despatch to the New York Times from Ottawa, Canada.

Since Canada expects President Roosevelt's triumph to be reflected in a new St. Lawrence waterway treaty and a new reciprocal tariff agreement, it was a considerable feat for Mr. Stevens to hold his own on the front page, but he accomplished it.

After telling a church congregation in Ottawa that he would continue his business-practices crusade even more vigorously now that he was out of the Cabinet, he called for reform of Canadian incorporation laws at a Toronto mass meeting organized by the Retail Merchants Association of Ontario.

Capital Mark-Up Alleged

He asserted that in 1928 and 1929 the authorized capital of Canadian companies had been marked up by $5,000,000,000 whereas the savings available for capital during that period were only $2,000,000,000.

He declared that of 131 business consolidations in 1921-30 sixteen concerns, or 12 per cent, had failed; forty-eight, or 37 per cent, had incurred deficits; twenty-one, or 16 per cent, had shown steadily declining profits, and only fifteen, or 11 per cent, had shown an improved position.

As an example of alleged sweating he cited a woman's coat bought by a large concern for $14 and sold for $27.50, of which price $13.50 went to the concern which sold it and only $3 to the girl who made it.

"There has been altogether too much fiddling while Rome burns," he said, "too much demand for patience and fortitude while those who could ameliorate the suffering have been enjoying unusual prosperity."

Political Intrigue Charged

Earlier, Mr. Stevens had informed Toronto newspaper men that he was being constantly shadowed by two Detroit private detectives, hired, he thought, by Canadian financial or political interests. He added that the same persons had offered $5,000 for evidence on which to base a charge of election irregularities against him.

All this was copy for the newspapers and Mr. Stevens also provided first-page material during the sittings of the Royal Commission on Business Practices, of which he was originally chairman and prime mover.

Maritime Province fishermen having testified that a cent a pound more for their catches would remedy conditions which had last year brought them an average income of only $200 per head, Mr. Stevens raised the issue of the extra cent and gave striking examples of the spread between producer and consumer to show that it could be reduced.

Difficulties for Social Reform

What will come out of Mr. Stevens's campaign is not yet clear. The president of a Toronto junior Conservative association resigned this week in protest against Mr. Stevens's leaving the Cabinet. Another Ontario Conservative politician declared that only Stevens Conservatives had a chance of reelection in Western Ontario.

Mr. Stevens has charged in his speeches that both Mr. Bennett and W. L. Mackenzie King, the Liberal leader, had discouraged his crusade.

J. S. Woodsworth, head of Canada's third party, returning this week from Japan, predicted that both of these statesmen would hide behind constitutional technicalities when the question of correcting the abuses were disclosed by Mr. Stevens arose.

Constitutional difficulties are already appearing. It has been found necessary to postpone until next year the conference between Prime Minister Bennett and the Provincial Premiers designed to agree on amendment of the British North America Act to permit social reforms.

The Roman Salute

The Italian Fascisti and the German Nazis now use the so-called Roman Salute, in which the right arm is raised palm outward. This salute has been misnamed, there being not the slightest historical justification for calling it Roman. Mussolini just saw it in the movie version of "The Eternal City" and ear-marked it for future use. This was revealed by Major Rossi, who is now serving a 30-year sentence for turning on the Duce, his former friend.

The misconception is due to the fact that a few of the statutes of the ancient Roman Emperors present them in the attitude of a dlocutio. The adlocutio was the address to the Roman troops delivered by the Emperor as his exclusive prerogative at his inauguration. In this position the Emperor casually raised either arm, first half clenched and index pointing upward in a gesture commanding silence and attention.

The ancient Romans saluted by handshaking (dextras jungere) or embracing between equals, while inferiors bent their knees before their superiors and kissed their hands (ad dextram regis). Soldiers used the same military salute that is used today. Sometimes the salutation consisted of a measured repetition of a certain phrase not unlike the action of a cheering team.

MRS. BURTON'S EXHIBIT

Mrs. Elizabeth Eaton Burton of Santa Barbara, Calif., and Paris, France, is showing 24 paintings of Japanese subjects at her current Peping exhibition which she has been asked to bring to Tokyo and Shanghai.

Of these, her painting of the Kamakura Buddha has won the highest praise from critics. This is Mrs. Burton's first trip to the Orient. She spent four months in Japan last spring and summer and for several weeks painted at Karuizawa, Nikko and other centers.

Bertha Lum, herself a noted artist who is well-known in Tokyo, writes of Mrs. Bueton's exposition:

"The exhibition of paintings by Mrs. Burton, now being shown at the Institute of Fine Arts, is so entirely different from anything which has been seen in Peiping that it immediately arrests attention.

"The quality that claims first place in her work is its extraordinary imagination, a quality which is so rarely seen that it should be eagerly welcomed....

"The greatest interests is not in the scenes of temples and courtyards, well done though some of these are, for they are less usual, but in the more fanciful subjects where Mrs. Burton has seen beyond the surface to something that is nearer the spirit of the Orient.

"Of individual paintings, I think that of the Kamakura Buddha the finest. To those who know the quiet places of Japan, it suggests all that is most peaceful there, with the scent of the lotus rising to carry messages of prayer far beyond. Also excellent is the Nara temple where the smoke from countless lanterns cloud the courtyard and the deer pause in the last ray of sunlight.

"It is the spirit of these paintings that is their greatest attraction. The Orient, and more particularly Japan, is a place of moving crowds and brilliant color, of rising mist and smoke of incense, and it is something of this that Mrs. Burton has found in her drawings."

Mrs. Burton is the daughter of the late Charles Frederick Eaton, a painter, art collector and landscape architect. She maintained a studio in Santa Barbara for many years where she designed and carried out in her workshops murals, hangings and screens. She has held a number other eastern cities as well as received several medals at the international expositions.

Recently she held an exhibition of her decorative leathers in Paris and on returning to California was asked to exhibit her European paintings in Los Angeles, Pasadena and Santa Barbara.

Her Japanese paintings in the present exhibition are:

Buddha, Kiyomizudera Temple, Kyoto; Kasuka Temple and ancient cryptomeria, Nara; View of Kasuga Temple, Nara; Temple at Nikko; Drum Tower, Nikko; A Pilgrimage at Nikko; The Sacred Bridge of Nikko; A peasant's garden near Karuizawa; Japanese Garden, Karuizawa; At the Antiquarian's, Nikko; Kegon Waterfall, out of the Lake Chuzenji; Dragon Waterfalls; In the garden of Hotel Kanaya, Nikko; Nunobiki Shrine, View of Nikko Bridge, Temple of the Sho-Guns, Tokyo; A lotus pool, Garden in Japan; The Kamakura Buddha; Kuan Yin of Amber; Temple Lanterns, Nara; Stone Buddhas on the river bank, Nikko; Temple Lotus Vase, Tokyo; and Kamakura Buddha.

Dr. Angell Scores Stress On Sports In U.S. Colleges

Yale President Says Schools Which Put Athletics Above Education Betray Trust

Defending the strict regulation of college athletics, President Angell of Yale insists that those institutions which put athletics above education are traitors to their trust, says the New York Times. His views were embodied in an article written for the official program of the Yale-Harvard football game on Nov. 24.

"In education sport has its proper place as recreation, as a basis for physical development and as a method of moral discipline," Dr. Angell writes, "but in any college or university worthy of the name it must always be secondary.

"Varied and valuable as are the peculiar opportunities, privileges and rewards of a member of a university team engaged in intercollegiate contests, these may be purchased at too high a price.

"The young man who wishes to give all his time and energy to sports is quite entitled to do so, if he can afford it, but he has no place in a really reputable college where intellectual development is the primary concern. A collegiate institution of which this is not true is traitor to its trust."

Discussing the question of regulation, the Yale president says:

"For the three-quarters of a century and more that intercollegiate sports have been developing in the United Staes, the leading institutions have little by little found themselves obliged to establish such regulations as now exist.

"This has been done partly to protect their strictly educational interests, and partly to protect college sport itself from becoming hopelessly debased into a purely commercialized undertaking carried on by hired men, thus losing one of the finest things about it, which, under the best conditions, is its spontaneous and unselfish character.

Like Laurel Crown of Greeks

"When men subject themselves for days and weeks to hard, self-sacrificing discipline for the joy of the game, for the prestige of the college, for the hope of victory, you have something of very high value and something untarnished by any thought of money, as was the laurel crown accorded the victor in the Grecian games.

"Even if the thought of personal glory enters in at times, as is almost inevitable with the publicity today accorded college sports, this fact reflects the gratification of a perfectly natural human ambition.

"The prevailing athletic regulations have been built up very slowly and only after long and careful study of the problem. They may not all be as wise as is desirable, but they are always in process of modification the better to meet existing condition, and none of them represent any sudden or arbitrary decisions made by ill-informed and impractical idealists.

"When intercollegiate sports were casual and informal, as they were at the outset, when teams met infrequently and placed before small crowds of students on open fields, the problems were simple. But the American flair for regimentation presently developed and with it grew the crowd interest in the contests, often fanned into flames of public excitement through the newspaper press.

Colleges in "Big Business"

"Coaching began to be professionalized, pretentious ball stands and stadia began to appear, the whole level of expenditure for athletics rose, and almost before it was realized what was happening, the colleges were launched into big business with huge gate receipts and all of the problems which go with the conduct of a public entertainment project.

"To be sure, the depression has deflated a good bit of the gate receipts, but the intrinsic nature of the problem is only aggravated by this circumstance.

"In the face of these developments, which not a few thoughtful observers profoundly deprecate, the educational leaders among our institutions have steadily struggled to safeguard the essential educational values which were unquestionably menaced by this movement, and to keep college sport itself clean and sound. "Our institutions of higher education have received their endowments, or in the case of State universities, their appropriations from the public treasury, not primarily to train men in sports, but to discipline their minds and characters that they may serve as leaders (to quote the old Yale charter) "in church and civil state.'"

Dr. Angell also declares that colleges cannot long maintain friendly relations in athletics if their actual standards are too far apart. On this point he says:

"If one recruits athletes and the other does not, if one pays its athletes directly or indirectly, and the other does not, if one imposes severe standards for entrance and for current academic rating and the other is notably very lax in these respects, if one allows its men to play for only a limited number of years and the other imposes no such limitations, such differences will sooner or later provoke friction and ill-will.

"This is because the one institution may be purchasing inferiority in athletic contests as the price of maintaining its ideals of intellectual and educational integrity; and presently, thanks in part to the exaggerated publicity given to certain college sports, this circumstance will breed resentment.

"Each college or university must therefore determine for itself what it holds to be the most wholesome conditions for the intellectual discipline and development of its students and then seek its enduring athletic relations with institutions which cherish substantially the same ideals.

"For some years Yale has enjoyed agreements with Harvard regarding the major features of the principles to which they will adhere in the conduct of their athletics. This has made for mutual confidence and understanding, which we may have to see continued for many years to come."

Asleep 33 Months, Now Reads Notes

Mother Discovers Patricia Maguire Will Obey Orders Held Before Her Eyes

Patricia Maguire of Chicago, asleep two years and nine months, came back to the twilight of consciousness and responds to commands held before her eyes, according to a recent story in The New York Times which follows.

The mother, who never abandoned hope for her daughter's awakening, told today of the experiments that indicate the 29-year-old young woman of Oak Park is rising from the coma that has baffled medical science.

Patricia, still unheeding the spoken command, now is able to recognize and follow instructions written on a slate and held before her.

"I'm the only one who has always believed she would recover," said Mrs. Sadie Miley, the mother. Mrs. Miley and another daughter, Mrs. Gladys Hansen, in whose suburban home Patricia has been slumbering since February, 1932, began to demonstrate the experiment.

"Pat, raise your hand," Mrs. Hansen wrote on a slate.

For a minute Patricia stared at the slate. Then, slowly, she raised her hand.

Patricia's apparent ability to coordinate her eye and mind was first discovered by her mother a few days ago.

Sitting beside her pretty daughter, Mrs. Miley watched Patricia move her eyes as if she were looking around the room. Mrs. Miley spoke to her.

But just as it had been since Feb. 15, 1932, the sleeping girl did not reply. Her eyes gave no indication that she had heard the words or recognized her mother.

Still trying desperately to reach into her daughter's mind and awaken her, Mrs. Milley picked up a pad of paper and a pencil.

"Raise your index finger," she wrote and placed the paper before her daughter's eyes. Slowly Patricia obeyed.

Mrs. Miley hurriedly wrote another message.

"Raise two fingers."

Again Patricia's optical nerves slowly carried the message to her brain and after a moment she lifted two fingers.

Mrs. Miley called to her daughter, Mrs. Hansen, and demonstrated the experiment to her.

"We decided Patricia would be able to read white on black easier than she could black on white so we sent out for a slate and now, for several days, she has been able to read our writing and carry out our instructions."

Miss Maguire's case has been watched closely by the medical profession throughout the world and diagnosed as a germ attack on the centers of consciousness in her brain.

The ailment first became noticeable to her family on Jan. 19, 1932, when Patricia had frequent spells of drowsiness. Then on Feb. 15 she collapsed across her bed as she was preparing to go to the office where she was employed as a private secretary. Since that day she has been unable to speak or give any evidence that she recognized her family.

Nearly every method known to science was enlisted in her behalf. Blood transfusions, injections of serums—even hypnotism—were tried. But through it all she slept on.

Protestantism Gains Members In Austria

Religious Revival Noted Under Stress Of Trade, Politics

A noteworthy increase in the membership of the Austrian Evangelical Church has been experienced during 1934.

In February, and again in July, the Government was in armed conflict with its political opponents, first with the Social Democrats and Marxists, and then with the Hitlerites, says the Christian Science Monitor. Such strife, resulting in bloodshed and the imprisonment of thousands of people, provoked great bitterness. In both cases this bitterness was partly directed against the Roman Catholic Church, which supports the Government.

Consequently, no less than 25,000 new members have recently joined the Evangelicals.

The Evangelical pastors say they do not discourage this movement. They do not wish converts to join their church as a political protest against any other religious organization. However, they accept these new members, because they think they would be failing to do their duty if they rejected persons knocking at their doors.

Many of the people seeking them come out of the sincerest desire for comfort encouragement and guidance. The intense strife here of recent months has caused great confusion and sadness, so people are looking for peace and assurance in religion.

Paris World Fair, 1937, To Center On Eiffel Tower

Exposition Is Designed To Give Economic Activity New Impulse

Profound international importance is attached in Paris to the Paris "World's Fair" of 1937, plans for which have finally been completed.

Primarily the exposition is designed to give a new impulse to the economic activity not only of France but of other nations as well, says the Christian Science Monitor. A gigantic effort will be made to make it a fresh point of departure for a revival, or an intensification, of commercial industry and tourism between all countries.

But almost equal significance is attributed to another aspect of the exposition: the opportunity it provides for presenting France anew to the rest of the world in a favorable light, in other words, putting France's best foot forward.

Most well-informed Frenchmen admit that in the last few years France has not enjoyed the popular favor it formerly found among the people of other countries. Circumstance, political and economic, have put the French in the unpopular position of appearing to be a static drag on a dynamic world. Whether the quesion be disarmament, treaty revision, war debts, import quotas, or the gold standard, it is undeniable that France has been made to seem the "backward" defender of the status quo in the midst of forces working for change.

Antidote to Criticism

Beyond a doubt much of the disparagement of which France has thus been the object is undeserved and due to misunderstanding. Furthermore, some of this misapprehension is now being gradually corrected. There still remains, however, a great deal of widespread disapproval, merited or not, of France's position and policies. This unpopularity has not only meant very heavy losses to French industry and commerce, but has also been a subject of serious concern to the diplomatic authorities at the Quai d'Orsay.

The coming exhibition is particularly well designed to help remedy this situation by calling the attention of other peoples to the best qualities and capacities of the French people. These attributes include, especially, a highly developed sense of beauty, of proportion and the gift of applying this artistic sense happily to their everyday existence in such a way as to brighten and beautify its every moment.

The official title which has just been adopted for the exposition indicates its preoccupation with this side of the French national character. It is to be called: "Paris International Exposition, 1937—Art and Technique in Modern Life." Its aim is officially described as being "to prove that art can beautify and uplift life for all, that no incompatibility exists between the beautiful and the useful—that art and technique should be indissolubly linked."

The site of the exposition has been definitely chosen. It will center around the Eiffel Tower—which will celebrate its semicentenary in 1937, the spacious gardens of the Champ de Mars and the Trocadero, on the banks of the Seine. The Trocadero itself is to be temporarily transformed from a rather unaesthetic "Victorian Byzantine" building into a modern structure by an effective but economical "false front."

Art and Technique

The Seine itself will play an important part in the exposition, becoming the scene of numerous magnificent nautical fetes and contributing to original decorative effects to be worked out with fountains of water and multicolored lights.

The exposition will include every branch of industry either directly or indirectly connected with art and technique. The fine arts will be well represented, and emphasis will be placed on the decorative arts.

Advertising, as an applied art, will be prominent, occupying an entire "street' in which the advertising industries of 14 nations will have each a separate pavilion.

Other sections include Urbanism and Architecture, Rural Constructions, Expression of Thought, Social Questions, Graphic and Plastic arts, Transportation and Tourism, Nautical Transportation and Yachting. A "Regional Center" will be devoted essentially to peasant life and agriculture. In another part of Paris a special "Yorkers' Center" is to be constructed.

Likewise outside the borders of the exposition, 11 acres of the Parc de Sceaux, on the southern edge of Paris, will be dedicated to the art of gardening. Another annex will be a huge athletic field where sports of all kinds will be centered.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Strangest Fishing Accident

Vicente Sanz y Alcoriza and a companion were fishing for sword fish off Morro Castle, Havana, Cuba one morning when they felt something tugging at the line. They began to pay out the line in order to tire out their catch when a swordfish leaped like a dart out of the water sinking its sharp "sword" into Vicente's chest. The latter's companion came to his aid, killing the swordfish and bandaging the wound. They immediately made for shore, being aided by a launch which, fortunately, was near. The wounded man was taken to a hospital where his condition was considered grave for some time, but he survived his harrowing experience.

The Jailed Jailer

S. V. Morris, city jailer of Shreveport, La., while present at the arraignment of a prisoner in city court ignored the warnings of the presiding justice who was displeased at some remarks made by the jailer. The justice found Morris guilty of contempt of court and sentenced him to a jail term of 3 days in addition to a $10 fine. Both the 3 days and an alternative jail term in lieu of the fine were served in the jailer's own jail. His superior declared he was unable to hire a substitute jailer, and therefore Morris would have to be both prisoner and jailer while serving his sentence.

Religion In U.S.S.R. Grows Despite Curbs

Many Communists Expelled By Party For Holding Faith

The persistence of religious feeling even among members of the Russian Communist Party, especially in such remote regions as the Moldavian Soviet Republic, has been disclosed by the annual party "cleaning," in which the records of all party members are examined by the Party Cleaning Commission, says the Christian Science Monitor.

A large number of Communists were expelled because of active work in religious organizations.

In a speech at Tiraspol, Moldavia, Emelyan Yarovslavsky, secretary of the commission, expressed alarm concerning the religious activities of Communists.

"This is no trifling matter," he declared. "Even while on their way to the party cleaning, Communist collective farmers at Grigoripolsk have sung 'God save thy people.' Communists and their families have collected money to repair churches. Communists have applied for permission to join religious organizations, and others are openly friendly with priests."

The Moldavian Communist Party, said Mr. Yarovslavsky, has almost entirely abandoned its anti-religious campaign.

"Why has our party ignored this matter?" he asked. "Why has the Young Communist League not carried on an active campaign against religion? Why have the trade unions done nothing to combat the growth of religion?"

If Communist leaders think religion is a dead issue in the Soviet Union, they are mistaken, said Mr. Yarovslavsky. "Is religion not a real force when there are 100,000 active churches in Russia, each with an active group of members?" he asks. "These churches still influences great numbers of our people, and the party must endeavor by every possible means to combat this growing influence."

Russians Like To Have Girls Pretty

But Split On Whether A Coquette Should 'Go To Extremes,' Such As Rouge

"If you want to be a coquette, it is all right with us," Michael Koltsov, member of the editorial board of "Izvestia," says in effect to the Soviet girl. "But we will not try to force you into developing your feminine wiles."

Koltsov's views on whether Soviet young women should leave their charms to nature or try to develop them through artificial means are contained in an article in "Izvestia." He strongly opposes the move to force the girls of the country to employ face powder and other cosmetics, according to a Moscow story to the Herald Tribune which follows.

"Not so long ago" Koltsov writes, "the bureaucrats in the Communist party and the Communist organization persecuted those among Soviet youth who wore clean shirts and neckties, used eau de cologne, face powder, or attended musical shows. They went so far even as to brand the wearers of neckties as enemies and to charge those who attended musical shows with moral disintegration. Times have changed, and now the bureaucrats are employing their old methods in another direction."

Koltsov quotes a speaker at a recent meeting of young Communists in Moscow.

"I wish to say a word about the young Communist girls," the speaker said. "There are certain factors which, when present, cause any woman to lose the elements of coquetry which she should possess. We must work to liquidate these factors. Every Soviet girl should have an appearance so attractive that it would be a pleasure to take her out for a walk. The time has come, I believe, when it must be obligatory for every girl to carry face powder and eau de cologne in her handbag."

At this point the speaker, according to Koltsoy, was interrupted by some one in the audience who said, "I suppose you are going to advise the use of rouge on the face next."

"Why go to extremes?" the speaker asked. "For the time being we can get along without rouge for the face. As for the future, we shall see."

Commenting on these remarks, Koltsov admonishes: "Don't use circulars to peculiarize face powder, rouge and lipstick. If you want our youth to live better and look better, see to it that their dress are tailored in a more stylish manner, that the quality of toilet articles is improved and the price lowered. Then the aids to embellishment will speak for themselves; it will be unnecessary to advertise them. Every one should enjoy himself as he sees fit. You can't order a girl to be coquettish. But, if she considers it worth while, she will develop her coquetry to a high degree, and certainly without your instructions."

Hardly less interesting than these comments on cosmetics and coquetry is the conversation on good proletarin manners which occurred recently at a party at which only Russians were present. One of the men suggested that in crowded tramcars members of his sex should offer their seats to women who otherwise would be forced to stand. This should be done, he explained, just as a courtesy. No one else, not even any of the women, agreed with him. A great majority assented to the view that a man should offer his seat to a woman only when she was carrying a child in her arms or, as in the case of a man, when she was crippled.

Insull Built Up Utility Empire Over 23 States

Began Career As London Office Boy, Came To U.S. As Edison's Secretary

Samuel Insull sr., who was seventy-five years old last Armistice Day, was free November 24 to ponder the rise and fall of a utility empire that had covered twenty-three states, and to debate the question whether after three-quarters of a century, he might have a future, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

The force and character of Insull was brought home to Chicago when he took the stand in his mail-fraud trial and told, in his own words, how he had risen in the world, how the utility empire he had built had toppled about his ears after the stock market crash of October, 1929, and what a fallen emperor had done.

Insull, so his own story runs, was born near London, the son of a small merchant who in his spare time was a nonconformist lay preacher. He had an education, one would believe from his story, equivalent to what a youngster gets in the eight grades of public school, and he, thereupon, got himself a job as an office boy in London at five shillings a week—which seems to be about $1.25 a week in American money.

Learned With Sisters' Aid

There is the picture of the Insull drive to get somewhere—learning shorthand from the head "clerk," his sisters giving him practice by dictating to him at night, getting himself outside jobs, volunteering to work of a Sunday for the English representative of Thomas A. Edison, coming to the United States to serve as the private secretary to the wizard of Menlo Park.

He aided in the organization of the various Edison companies, the tube and lamp companies, the machine works, and when the Edison companies were consolidated. Insull became second vice-president. That was in 1889, and three years later he was offered the presidency of the Chicago Edison Company.

Insull cast a dubious eye on the Chicago situation, but he had consolidated the various down-at heel power plants of the city and out of that consolidation grew the Common-wealth Edison company, the utility which has the electric power and light monopoly of Chicago, the keystone of the Insull utility empire.

There is a suburban and farming territory in Lake County, the next county north of Cook County, which is approximately Chicago. Insull believed that suburban homes and farm homes could be supplied with electric light at a cost not too high from the consumer's viewpoint. Out of that grew the Public Service Company of Northern Illinois, another "jewel of the Insul empire" as it was referred to during the Insull mail fraud trial, and the Middle West Utilities Company, an extension of the gift of electricity to scattered communities. The day came when Middle West served 5,000 such communities.

Built Up Shaky Company

The people's Gas Light and Coke Company, the consolidation of the gas companies serving Chicago, had not been doing so well.

Insull became president and soon he had organized a coke by-products company and taken the company out of the "red."

Now Insull was beginning to blossom forth. He took control of the Midland Utilities Company.

Insull formed his holding companies to protect the Insull management and it was the crash of the stock market that toppled the holding companies, and the crash of the holding companies unseated Insull.

Insull said on the stand that he thought the market crash of 1929 was just a market adjustment.

Faced Unusual Crises

But Insull, who in his heyday had sat on the boards of eighty-five companies, was chairman of sixty-five, president of eleven, the controlling power of an empire that employed 72,000 workers for companies with assets of $4,000,000,000 and investors, numbering upward of 600,000, found himself up against a financial situation without parallel.

There came receiverships. The Insull empire was tottering. Insull said he resigned so as not to embarrass those who had made him a receiver of the companies, those who were his associates. He was old and tired, he said, in need of a rest, and so he went to Europe.

That was in June, 1932. In October the indictments began to be returned. From Paris, Insull went to Italy for a brief stay, and then on to Greece. Greek judges decided that Insull could not be extradited. The United States canceled his passport. The government continued to exert pressure, despite one court decision after another, and so in March, his deadline approaching, he took to sea in a tramp steamship, the Maiotis.

On March 29, the steamer put into the harbor of Istanbul. The captain said he wished to coal and provision and put out to sea again. Turkish authorities decided that the tramp steamer might have something more valuable to offer than orders for coal and provisions and Insull was taken off and lodged in jail.

Early in April Insull was started back to the United States.

The Jury

The men on the jury who acquitted Samuel Insull and sixteen co-defendants in the Federal mail fraud trial were:

Roy C. Richardson, forty-seven years old, of Evanston, a dealer in industrial diamonds, a member of the Union League Club, Medinah Shrine and St. Luke's Episcopal Church; married, no children.

Walter J. Cassidy, twenty-seven, of Chicago, and Insurance salesman and a Catholic; married, no children.

John D. Lent, fifty-five, of Peru, Ill., a director of the Western Clock Company; he is president of the Peru school board, active in Boy Scout work and a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church; married, the father of eight.

Walter R. Walter, twenty-five, employed of his father's bookbinding concern in Chicago; active in boys' work and a member of the Church of Our Saviour, Episcopal; married, no children.

Edward W. Hawkins, thirty-five, unUemployed when he became a juror, was formerly a telephone engineer; he is a MMason, an Epispalian and belongs to a golf club; married, no children.

George Barkley, forty-five, of Yorkville, Ill., formerly Republican Sheriff of Kendall County, now an auto dealer; a Mason, a Methodist; married and the father of four children.

Britain May Seek Accord On Arms With Reich Govt.

Baldwin's Speech Seen As Pointing To Move To Cut Tension In Europe

The speech on German rearmament made in the House of Commons on Nov. 28 by Stanley Baldwin, Lord President of the Council, was believed to foreshadow a new British attempt to bring Germany back into the League of Nations.

Until after the Saar plebiscite in January, the British realize it will be useless to make diplomatic overtures to Berlin, but a new effort is probable early next year, even though its chances of success are small, says the New York Times. Once more the British are about to try a middle-of-the-road policy in an attempt to end the tension in Europe and ward off a new race in armaments.

There are some in England who would have the government legalize German rearmament and give Germany full equality rights as the best method of improving the European atmosphere. But such a solution, in the government's view, would simply be yielding to blackmail. To follow such a course would be to grant Nazi Germany what was refused to the peaceful Democratic governments of the German Republic.

On the other hand, the British are not enamored of the present French policy, which takes no legal cognizance of German re-armament but permits illegal rearmament to continue unchecked. The course the British are coming to favor is a revival of their draft convention granting Germany an orderly increase in her army, but only in return for her accepting the Eastern Locarno scheme and returning to the League.

If such a solution could be found, the British feel it would give Germany equality and France the security she needs. The fact that Germany is not at all likely to accept such a scheme will not deter the British from pushing it when the right time comes.

The debate in the British House of Commons and the speeches of Winston Church, Stanley Baldwin and Sir John Simon, the Foreign Secretary, received more attention in the French press because of what was said regarding Germany's rearming than because of any diplomatic developments that may follow this exposure of the situation, says a despatch from Paris, dated Nov. 29, to the New York Times.

"Does all this means new negotiations?" le Temps asks, and finds in the words of Mr. Baldwin and Sir John an indication that it does. There follows a second question. Will these negotiations tend toward recognition of a new scale of German armaments near, or somewhere near, the present German strength and discarding the last pretense that the conditions of the Treaty of Versailes are valid?

Naturally, there is here more than a suspicion that such is the intended "maneuver." Sir John's words are especially regarded with suspicion where he said: "We could like to see an agree disarmament at a low level. If we cannot get the unattainable, we must seek to secure an agreement at the lowest level at which it can be obtained."

Opinion Is Divided

Opinion here is certain to be passionately divided as to whether an agreement at any level is worth having if it entails the oficial discarding of the treaty conditions imposed on Germany. Already newspapers like the Journal des Debats have begun to indicate that Germany's interest in such an agreement would be only to break it and arm clandestinely beyond its limitations.

With the usual discretion that attends his movements, Chancellor Hitler's special envoy, Joachim von Ribbentrop, arrived in Paris this morning charged with the mission of preparing for a meeting between Rudolf Hess, German Minister Without Portfolio, and several leading persons in Paris. It was reported that Herr von Ribbentrop had a conversation with Foreign Minister Pierre Laval today, but his name did not appear on the official list of Foreign Office visitors.

M. Laval will make an important speech on French foreign policy during the discussion of the budget tomorrow.

Alliance Urged

Great Britain was described on Nov. 29 as the only nation able to save France from war, by Adrian Dariac, in his report on the foreign affairs budget.

The Deputy disagreed with the recent valuation of Russia's military aid in case of war with Germany, as expressed by Leon Archimbaud, Reporter of the Budget.

"It would be superfluous to state again," M. Dariac wrote, "that the acts of the German Government prove its firm resolve, despite threats, to rearm and prepare for war and revenge. The sole assured guarantee "would be a Franco-British defensive alliance."

M. Dariac stressed the danger of a surprise attack by Germany through Switzerland. He said Germany had already established a "sports' camp near the Swiss border where university students were taught to drive motorized equipment in military formation.

German Equality Stressed

The meager comment on the House of Commons debate on German rearmament on Nov. 29 is summed up and receives a certain final and official character in an article appearing today in the Diplomatische-Politische Correspondenz, which reflects semi-officially the opinion of the Foreign Office, says a Berlin despatch to the New York Times.

No attempt is made to deny specifically any of the charges made, the paper answering all complaints with the orthodox German reply that the failure to give Germany her promised equality is the root of all evil in European international relations.

The press makes it evident that the Commons debate has not changed the German attitude toward Geneva and that Germany will not return to the League of Nations until she receives the equality agreed upon in 1932.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Lighthouse Rent

Prior to the enactment of the Government salary classification act of 1923, the use of quarters for keepers of lighthouses and their families was furnished by the Government, this being in addition to the cash compensations for services rendered. But with the passage of that law it was held that the compensation fixed pursuant to the passage of the act was all that an employee should receive, and that emoluments were not authorized and employees of lighthouses should pay rent for their quarters. However, salaries were increased proportionately. For example: Before 1923, if an employee received $1200 per annum and free housing, his salary was increased to $1440 per year and $240 was deducted for rent. The change was simply a matter of having their entire compensation put on a fixed monetary basis.

The Kobe A.D.C. produced a most successful play under the direction of Mrs. Yorke-Irwin. The play was titled "The Middle Watch" and was acclaimed a great success, the hall of the K.R. & A.C. being well attended both nights. A new-comer, Mrs. H. Hooker deserved special mention—no less did Mr. O. Skinner. The entire cast was well chosen, and all did credit to their roles. The net proceeds is to be given to the Seamen's Institute.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Taylor and their son Kenneth of Shanghai, are now in Kobe visiting their daughter Mrs. H. Harker of Shioya.

Columbia Library Formally Opened

$4,000,000 Building Has Shelf Space For 3,000,000 Volumes Without Crowding

Columbia University formally opened South Hall, its new $4,000,000 library, the gift of Edward S. Harkness, with addresses by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of the university, and Dr. John Buchan. English author and member of Parliament for the Scottish Universities, on Nov. 29.

This building, the twenty-third on the campus, is in Italian Renaissance style and was designed by James Gamble Rogers. There are accommodations for 3,000,000 volumes and future provision can be made for an additional million.

A frieze around the top of the fifth story bears the names of 18 men of letters, while panels under the large front windows are inscribed with the names of 24 American statesmen and authors.

Special Reading Rooms

Reproduced on the three panels over the main entrance is the seal of King's College, used from 1754 to 1784; the seal of Columbia College under the regents of the University of the State of New York, in use from 1784 to 1787, and, and in the center, the seal of Columbia College, which has been in use since 1787, and is used by the entire university today.

South Hall contains 16 special reading rooms, in addition to the main reading room and the departmental seminar and work rooms. Fifteen tiers of book stacks occupy the central portion of the building, each air-conditioned to provide the best conditions of book storage. On the ground floor is the Harkness Academic Theater, an assemblyroom seating about 300 persons.

"Laboratory Library"

According to Dr. Butler, South Hall is a "labratory library," since it is "designed not merely for the storage and distribution of books, but for constant working with books by teachers and students themselves, with circumstances and surroundings of the greatest comfort and conveniences. Under present-day conditions, he said, a thoroughly modern and well-equipped library "is the very heart and center of the work of any institution of higher education."

Dr. Butler paid especial tribute to the philanthropic activities of Mr. Harkness, whose $4,000,000 gift several years ago made possible the erection of South Hall.

Dr. Buchan characterized a great library as a "silent witness to the unity of human wisdom and the catholicity or human culture" and suggested four contributions which a country is entitled to expect from any university. First, a just perspective, a sense of proportion and the ability to look candidly at facts. Second, a rational humility which "enables men to see themselves in their proper rank in the scale of things." Third, a reasoned critical spirit in a world which "has no room for a fossilized conservatism," and fourth, a rational conservatism.

Interest Revives In 'Windmill' Type Of Plane

Redesigned Ship Held Capable Of Making Vertical Take-off

That whirling dervish of aviation the autogiro, appears to be on the verge of a renaissance which promises not only to retrieve its somewhat tarnished reputation with flying men but to make it a strong contender for first honors as the long predicted "back-yard" flying machine that will turn the average man in the street into a wayfarer of the sky. For the "windmill plane" is staging a comeback, after ridding itself of inherent faults which no amount of ballyhoo concerning the admitted virtues it possessed in its original form could keep from cropping up when they were sure to prove the most embarrassing and disastrous.

So says C. B. Allen in an article for the New York Herald Tribune's November 18 issue, which follows:

The 'giro's new oulook on life has been gained through abandonment of its producers' early attempts to effect a blissful union between the rotor, or revolving wing, which is the craft's basic feature, and the fixed control surcaces of the conventional airplane. It was one of those matches which soon proved to have definite and devastating limitations; consequently the autogiro's inventor, Senor Juan de la Cierva, and his associates realized the hopelessness of their attempts at hybridization and set about developing a machine whose entire control depends upon tilting the rotor itself in flight.

New 'Giro Wingless

Such a machine made an impressive demonstration for the benefit of government officials interested in aviation ten days ago at Washington an aerial ferry service from Floyd Bennett Field to any part of New York City last week by a series of landings and take-offs from Pier 9 at Old Slip and the East River. It is the so-called "wingless" 'giro, since it has no need of the vestigal wing which carried the ailerons and lent lateral stability to the old-style autogiro, and it completely eliminates possibility of the "autogiro spin" and other dangerous characteristics of the original "windmill plane" that resulted from stalling and rendering useless its airplane control surfaces during vertical descent.

Why this happened is apparent when it is remembered that airplane controls function only by deflecting the air rushing past them in flight, whereas the supporting blades of the autogiro rotor continue to cleave the air whether the machine itself is coming straight down or going straight ahead and sustain the craft effectively when its airplane-type controls have long since lost their grip on the air.

Ignorance or abuse of this principle by amateur airmen enthusiastically trying to emulate the amazing flying feats performed by such master pilots as Jim Ray, dean of the American autogiro school, has strewn the flying fields of this country with shattered rotor blades and other 'giro debris and brought the "windmill plane" into worse repute among flyers generally than it deserves—even in its old-fashioned form. Another feature of the original 'giro that has contributed to its unpopularity among airmen is its exasperatingly slow cruising speed. This shortcoming is said to have been remedied to a surprising degree in the new "direct control" 'giro, elimination of the formerly required fixed-wing structure having worked wonders in reducing the machine's "parasite" resistance to the air and thereby increasing its speed.

Vertical Take Take-Off Possible

The "ace-in-the-hole" of the new autogiro's sponsors, however, and the feature about which almost nothing has been said in this country, although successful experiments have been made with it abroad, is a means of causing the machine to take off vertically without any preliminary run—a much more difficult matter than the 'giro's long-mastered trick of vertical descent. This is achieved in simple but ingenious fashion by a rotor with controllable-pitch blades which can be flattened out to a nonlifting angle, then suddenly let into full lifting pitch. The rotor, of course, is set in motion originally (as in present autogiros) by a clutch drive from the engine, but this is disengaged prior to the actual take-off by the same lever that lets the rotor blades from their negative, high-speed position into normal lifting pitch. Once in the air there is no connection, either in the engine and the rotor.

Actual tests and careful calculations show that the accumulated momentum of the over-speeded rotor is sufficient to lift the 'giro, fully loaded, fifty to 100 feet into the air before the energy expended in this operation slows the whirling blades to their normal rate of revolution.

Low Power Motor Used

The wingless autogiro used by Mr. Ray, who is vice-president of the Autogiro Company of America, in his demonstration flights here and at Washington is not yet equipped with a controllable-pitch rotor, but it was able to land vertically and take off again after a run of only ten to fifty feet, depending on wind conditions and the load carried by the 'giro. This despite the fact that the craft used is a somewhat crude experimental model with a motor of but seventy-five horse power as compared to the 165 horse power engine used in the old-style, two-place Pitcairn autogiro manufactured at Willow Grove, Pa., until a year or so ago, when the "windmill plane" project was abandoned temporarily as impracticable.

It is an illuminating commentary on the advances represented in the new-type 'giro that, for all the discrepancy in power, the direct-control craft has a top speed of 105 miles an hour and cruises at ninety (averaging twenty-five miles to the gallon of gasoline) as compared to a top speed of ninety miles an hour and a cruising speed of seventy-five for its oldstyle predecessor.

There is also the matter of minimum speed in level flight—seventeen miles an hour for the wingless model and twenty-four for the earlier model—not to mention that the direct control machine now being flown by Ray has an empty weight of 600 pounds and carries a useful load of 540, heretofor an efficiency undreamed of for such machines. The fact that the new wingless ship has a three instead of a four-bladed rotor and that the blades fold back along the fuselage so the machine can be housed with comfort in a standard seven by nineteen-foot one-car garage is of considerable additional interest to the prospective private owner.

That the wingless 'giro should lend itself to cheaper production in quantity than the conventional type airplane seems obvious because of its reduced flying surface areas and simplicity of control. Both the Pitcairn organization and the Kellett Autogiro Corporation, of Philadelphia, a manufacturing licensee which has produced a wingless 'giro of its own design, foresee a great future for this type of aircraft as soon as their develop mental work on it has been completed, and they are laying plans accordingly. As to the present status and future possibilities of the autogiro, Wallace Kellett told the Federal Aviation Commission:

Possible to Use Them on Roads

"Today my company produces 'giros which are safe, comparatively easy to fly, will operate where airplanes cannot operate and do things taht airplanes can't. These machines, however, are still inefficient at high speeds and fairly expensive, due to low production.

"What our company can do is quite another matter. We can build 'giros that will ascend vertically from fifty to 100 feet in the air and then proceed on their way. We can build them with folding rotor blades so that the pilot, without leaving his seat, can fold the rotor and taxi into his garage or unfold it and take off; we can even build them so that the pilot, after folding the rotor blades, can connect a rod drive gear between the motor and the wheels and proceed from the airport on which he has landed to his home just as he would with a motor car."

Swanson Asks More Men And Ships In Navy

Secretary Holds Ships Valueless Unless Manned By Full Crews

Claude A. Swanson, Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report to the President for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934, says that although the United States may reduce its naval strength proportionately with other powers, it is imperative that a navy second to none be maintained, according to the Washington correspondent of the Herald Tribune. He warns also of the dangerous shortage of personnel in the navy at present, saying that "ships are valueless unless manned by adequate crews of trained and experienced officers and men.

Secretary Swanson's report cites the fine records made during the fiscal year by the various branches of the service, citing high praise for the air service, of which he says: "I believe firmly that under our present system our naval aviation is second to none in the world in efficiency, and I am strongly of the opinion that any radical changes, such as a united air service, would be a serious mistake.

Building Policy Adopted

"The year ended June 30, 1934," Secretary Swanson says in the general remarks at the beginning of his report, "has been made notable by the adoption of a definite policy to build up our Navy to the strength permitted by the treaties of naval limitation to which this country is a party.

"'Most important in this respect was the passage by Congress and the approval by the President of the Trammell-Vinson act, which established the strenth of the Navy and authorized the construction of vessels and aircraft to bring the Navy to the prescribed strength and to replace ships as they become over age. The same resolution has been evidenced by the Congress in the appropriation of money for the increase of the Navy, and by the Executive in the allocation of sums under the national industrial recovery act and the emergency employment act."

Work on Seventy Ships

All these activities, he points out, have brought about action involving work on seventy naval vessels, some already partly constructed, others to be laid down during the fiscal year 1935. Although this program will have been completed by January, 1937, he says, the Navy still will lack seventy-eight ships of her full treaty strength. The shortage will include one aircraft carrier, two light cruisers and fifty-one destroyers and twenty-four submarines as replacements for overage vessels now in use in those categories.

"It is to be hoped," he says, "that the Congress will continue to appropriate the necessary funds from year to year for the replacement of these vessels. That action would be necessary to maintain the strength of the Navy at the limit prescribed by the treaties, in the most economical and orderly way, as recommended in my previous annual report."

$279,720,366 Spent in Year

The total amount spent by the Navy from its regular appropriation during the fiscal year 1934 was $279,720,366. In addition to this $37,057,704.94 of N. L. R. A. and emergency construction funds were spent on the Navy. For the current fiscal year the amounts are estimated at $337,749,022 and $165,528,729.97, respectively.

Figures cited in the report show the United States to have had, on July 1, ninety-two ships of treaty categories built and under age on December 31, 1933, while Great Britain had 139 and Japan 165. The respective total tonnages are 766,465, 989,889 and 654,425.

The United States also had, as of that date, sixty-eight ships building or appropriated for, totaling 234,000 tons. Great Britain had sixty-two, amounting to 171,410 tons, and the Japanese had forty-five, amounting to 124,696 tons. The United States still had the right, under the treaties, to lay down seventy-eight more ships, aggregating 136,975 tons, before December 31, 1936. Great Britain was entitled to forty-four ships, with an aggregate tonnage of 132,963, and Japan to one destroyer of 1,500 tons, to replace the Miyuki, lost at sea about July 1.

"It may be seen," Secretary Swanson says, "that under this Administration very satisfactory progress has been made toward building up to the full strength alloted our Navy by the treaty. However, it must be realized that ships are valueless unless manned by adequate crews of trained and experienced officers and men. A treaty navy obviously requires much more personnel than the much smaller establishment which we have been operating in the past years. At present the shortage of both officers and men threatens the high state of efficiency which our fleet has attained."

"Repeated requests from vessels of the fleet for sufficient personnel to man essential battle stations and to avoid a continuous and detrimental turnover of enlisted personnel that is unavoidable with the existing shortage, have been received during the year," he says under "Personnel."

Although the minimum below which it has been decided it is not safe for the Navy to poerate itself at 86,615 enlisted men, Secretary Swanson says, the appropriation for the fiscal year ending next June allows of an enlisted personnel of only 81,500.

"Attention," he says, "is again invited to the fact that to continue to operate the fleet with an insufficient number of men is a serious menace to success in battle in the event of an unanticipated emergency. Combatant ships of the fleet should be at all times prepared to meet an enemy." To provide officers for the new ships, he adds, it will be necessary to increase the number of appointments to the Navy Academy by one-third in the fiscal year 1936 and by an additional one-fourth in the following years.

Secretary Swanson's report discusses the work of the naval air service during the year, and speaks of the two world's records set by naval personnel—the formation flight of six patrol planes from San Francisco to Pearl Harbor, seting a new world's record for formation flights over water; and the world's altitude record set by Lieutenant Commander T. G. W. Settle and Major C. L. Fordney, of the Marine Corps, in their balloon flight into the stratosphere.

"Fleet aircraft," Secretary Swanson says, "have participated to the fullest extent in all fleet problems and exercises, operating under all conditions encountered as an integral arm of the fleet." At the end of the fiscal year, the Navy had on hand 936 serviceable airplanes, with 227 more ordered.

Among other notable feats of the year, he mentions the transit of the Panama Canal by the entire fleet in about forty-eight hours, the first time the fleet as a unit has made a continuous transit of the canal.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Vain To The Foolish

Dom Pedro II, Emperor of Brazil (1825-1891) poet, philosopher and scholar, was the most enlightened monarch of the 19th century. No ruler has ever done more for the education, welfare and prosperity of his country. He was intensely democratic and sold titles of nobility. For $10,000 one could buy from him the title of "conder." But with the money obtained in this fashion Dom Pedro built and endowed the imposing lunatic asylum in Rio de Janeiro. After the building was completed he ordered this inscription placed on the gable: "From the Vain to the Foolish." Dom Pedro was forced to abdicate and to leave the country on November 15, 1889. He refused an annual pension of $280,000 offered him by the Brazilian Republic.

Britain Removes Danger In Saar

Reich Agrees To Proposal For International Military Force In Area

The reply of the German Government to the inquiries of the British Government and the Committee of Three as to their attitude to the proposal to constitute an international military force for the Saar was received here today, says the Geneva correspondent of the Times in a despatch dated Dec. 6.

The article continues:

The German Government, while noting, as they were bound to do, that they did not consider such a force to be necessary, said that they would not object to its presence in the Saar providing it were kept within the limits required by the purpose which it was intended to serve. At the same time they agreed to join the French Government in not claiming representation in the international force. The favorable decision of the German Government was communicated to the Foreign Office last night. It sets the seal on the constructive proposals which were made by Mr. Eden and M. Laval here yesterday.

The decision of Great Britain has gone far to rid the Saar question of its most threatening aspects. It has also given incalculable reinforcement at a critical moment to the authority and prestige of the League. With the exception of the extreme partisans of National-Socialism in the Saar, representatives of all shades of opinion at Geneva have hailed the event of yesterday with unqualified relief and satisfaction, in which those who are responsible for the preservation of order in the territory share to a peculiar degree. Appreciation and gratitude for the decision of Sir John Simor, Mr. Eden, and the British Government as a whole were heard on all sides today. The loyal compliance of M. Laval with the British plan, and the masterly handling of the proceedings by Mr. Eden also received their due share of praise.

Organizing The Force

Active preparations for the organization of the international force are now going on. The view of the British delegation, who, having taken the decisive initiative, are entittled to take a leading voice in the practical organization of the scheme, is that the force, whole being kept as compact and homogenerous as possible, should include representatives of Powers who were neutral in the War and were not signatories of the Versaliles Treaty. The British delegation and the Saar Governing Commission are agreed that the force should consist of from three to six battalions (according to their actual strength, that they should be in the Saar before Christmas if possible, or at least by the end of the year. (The British troops can be at their stations in the Saar at six days' notice).

As to the choice of troops, it is regarded as essential that they should be longservice soldiers—not short-service conscripts—a consideration which excludes, for instance, a reported intention to use Swiss troops. The final arrangement will depend on the advice of military experts who are now on their way to Geneva—Major-General A. C. Temperiey, the British military representative to the League of Nations, left London this morning and will advise the Council what troops Great Britain can send—but it is most probable that the main body of the force will be British and Italian, and that there will also be Dutch and Swedish contingents. And it is certain that each country will take care to send picked troops.

Kishu Oranges Yield Millions To Wakayama

Mikan Shipped To All Parts Of Europe And U.S. As Well As Japan

By SHIZUKO ARIMA

The season of Mikan sets in when a cold northerly wind begins to sweep across the southern towns of Japan, announcing the advent of winter. It is the occasion on which the picturesquo inland sea of Japan may be dotted with many boats loaded with cargo of golden colored mikan to capacity sailing portward under white sails.

The orchards in Kishu, Wakayama prefecture where the celebrated Kishu mikan grows, yield about ¥4,410,000 of Mikan annually. The Kishu oranges are shipped to all parts Japan as well as to the U.S.A. and to Europe.

The fruit has been called "Tachibana" or Noble citron-tree, from time unmemorial. It was hightly esteemed in former days as a quality fruit. It is interesting to go back to the old history of Japan, to the year of Tempei 18 (746 a.d.), when the Emperor Shomu honoured the name of Tachibana in praise of the loyalty of his Minister Katsuragi-O. Mikan now-a-days, is after called by another name "Koji", meaning happy event, and as such the fruit is used for the congratulatory gift.

Mikan Customs

1.) Mikan-Osame: A custom of Mikan offering is observed on January 7th, on which day the Higashi Honganji in Kyoto commences to attend to its office work. All merchants who maintain business relations with the temple offer to the temple beautiful golden fruits carried in the green bamboo woven baskets as the new year congratulatory gifts.

2.) Mikan-Maki: Mikan throwing: This is one of the local customs which takes place on a festival celebrated by blacksmiths on the 8th day of the November. This fete is called "Fuigo-matsuri". Fuigo is a bellows used by blacksmith. On this day, the blacksmih takes a holiday, decorating the bellow and the fire place with Shimenawa (straw rope with tufts of straw or of cut paper at fixed intervals, hung before shrine in order to sanctify the precinct with it). The sake, the rice-cake, Mikan, Dried cuttle-fish, and the rice boiled with red beans are offered to the bellows. The reason for offering mikan to Kami, or deity, on the occasion of Fuigo Matsuri is due to an old tradition that the bellows came down under the Mikan tree from heaven or some unknown place. There is also a belief that mikan has the power of preventing one from catching cold or catching measles when one eats this fruit after it was offered to Kami. The custom of the mikan-maki (the mikan throwing) is relating to the above tradition. After mikan are offered to the Shrine or Kami all day on this festival day, they are taken down from the cellar and thrown among children and the neighbours who come round to the entrance of the blacksmith. Grown up people as well as children have a merry time, rushing to gather the fruits.

Mikan Cultivation

The cultivation of the mikan in Japan dates back to the Ashikaga period (1560 a.d.) when the mikan tree was for the first time imported from Unshu in China. The Kishu farm is famed for its unrivalled mikan to present days. In the year 1619, the mikan trees which were imported from Unshu in China for the second time in the Tokugawa era, were planted on the farms of the Arita district of Kishu. This is the origin of the Kishu-mikan, a variety sold in the market at the present time. Later they were distributed among several districts in the neighbourhood. The improved variety is named as Senshu, or Yatsushiro-mikan in Kumamoto prefecture, the southeast part of Kyushu Island.

In the 2nd year of Tensho (1574 a.d.), Mr. Sen-emon Ito who lived in Miyahara villave, Wakayama prefecture, purchased the young mikan trees from Yatsushiro, Kumamoto prefecture, and planted them on his farm. He had great success in producing very sweet mikan with the sweetest and of beautiful color and finest fragrance which is better than the other kinds. The plantation on the farm was fortunately suitable for mikan cultivation. Yorinobu Tokugawa, the feudal lord of Kishu-Wakayama, paid considerable attention to encourage the cultivation of mikan, and instructed them to exercise the utmost effort for the promotion of the mikan cultivation. The mikan has been produced in increasing quantity every year, and shipped to Osaka and Sakai by water way.

The mikan produced around Kishu, command the highest price of all. Sixty years since that time, a man named Tobei who lived in Ryuga-village sent 400 baskets of mikan to Yedo (old time Tokyo) for sale. After his arrival in Yedo, he found Niiyama-ya, the fruit store owner at Kyobashi, and made him his wholesale agent. Ibu, Suruga, and Mikawa-mikan were on the market of Yedo in those days, but the Kishu-mikan proved to be the best in its quality.

Yedo Taste

The mikan with a sour touch in its sweetness in taste, rouge added to its natural golden color, and round in shape was considered by Yedo people as best fruit to the kind. It was said one and half basketful of mikan had the value of 1 Ryo, ¥30 at present value of money. To-bei returned to his native town and consulted with the farmers to make business in mikan production. The farmers who had mikan orchards organized a sort of business association among themselves.

On the following year, he sent 2000 baskets of the fruits to Yedo. The whole stock of these expensive fruits were all sold out promptly. The cultivation of mikan at Kishu extended to many neighbouring villages under the patronage of Tokugawa, the Daimyo of Kishu. Thus, the annual production of mikan had been increasing with leaps and bounds Kishu was able to ship 50,000 baskets of fruits to Yedo.

There is a popular ballad about Kishu mikan which runs:

"Okino kurainoni shiraho ga mieru, Arewa Kino-kuni, Mikan-bune" which means:—
"While it is still dark at dawn,
White sails are seen coming shoreward from afar,
Are they the Mikan boats coming from far-off country of Ki!".

The Paradox of Carbon

Diamonds, the hardest and whitest things in the world, are pure carbon. Lamp black, the softest and blackest, is also pure carbon. According to the Encyclopedia Britannica, "the physical and chemical properties of diamonds . . . . have a special interest in view of the extraordinary difference between the physical characteristics of the diamond and those of . . . . lamp-black (charcoal) with which it is chemically identical and into which it can be converted by the action or heat and electricity".

DR. NOSS DIES

Dr. Christopher Noss, D.D., of Aizu-Wakamatsu, Fukushima Ken, died at 5 p.m. Monday, December 31, at the home of his son, the Rev. George S. Noss, at Aomori. His death followed a stroke of apoplexy on December 26 from which he never regained consciousness.

Dr. Noss, well-known missionary in Japan who came here for the first time in 1895, had gone to the home of his oldest son with two of his youngest sons, David and Richard, students in the American School in Tokyo, to spend the holidays. Mrs. Noss is now in the United States where she had been called by the illness of their eldest son. Surviving are, in addition to Mrs. Noss, nine sons and three daughters.

Funeral services were held at Aomori Wednesday and will be held at Sendai Saturday following which interment will be made in the foreign cemetery there.

Dr. Noss came to Japan in 1895 as a missionary of the Reformed Church in the United States. For a time he taught in the Tohoku Gakuin, Sendai, but during most of his missionary career he was an evangelistic missionary and lived at Sendai and Aizu-Wakamatsu. He was the author of the English edition of Dr. Rudolf Lange's Textbook of Colloquial Japanese, which has passed through several editions. Because of the illness of his first wife, Dr. Noss was obliged to interrupt his missionary career and return to the United States. For a time, until his return to Japan, in 1910, he was professor of systematic theology in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church at Lancaster, Pa., of which he was an alumnus.

Dr. Noss, a son of the late Rev. John George Noss and his wife, was born in Huttington, Indiana on Sept. 23, 1869. He graduated with high honors from Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa., and sometime later was elected a member of the Theta chapter of the Phi Beta Kappa society. He was married to Miss Lura Boyer upon the completion of his theological preparation, in 1895 and they came to Japan as missionaries. Mrs. Noss died in 1907 and in 1909, Dr. Noss married Miss Carol Day, a teacher in the Shippen School for Young Ladies, and the two set out for Japan in 1910.

Dr. Noss enthusiastically worked for the organization of what is now called the Sendai Shinsei Kwan, an interdenominal agency for the propagation of the gospel through newspapers and corresopondence.

Pantages Show Presents Varied Entertainment

Singers And Dancers From United States Make Hit In Tokyo

Although the billboards outside the Nippon Gekijo announce the Pantages Show is from New York and Los Angeles, the eastern city is there by courtesy, since the Show is largely made up of westerners who have had a close association with the films in Hollywood.

When Tommy Jones from Wyoming, the fine baritone singer, appears in sombrero and all the regalia of the cowboy, and sings of "Heading for the Last Round Up," and Harvey Perry shows how skillfully he can spin the lariat to lasso the Hollywood Studio Girls, it is realized that the Pantages Show which originated in Seattle, had something characteristic of the West to offer in the entertainment that they had brought from the Pacific Coast to offer to the Tokyo public on New Year's day.

While this kind of amusement is no longer a novelty to Japanese audiences, the members of the company are all good troupers and experts in their specialities, and there was no doubt of their warm reception on the opening day.

Protest from Gods

When Miss Margaret Jaspar, young and blonde, stood up to conduct the orchestra, few in the audience knew of her long experience as a leader of orchestra and member of a musical family in the United States. Perhaps the audience was just a little surprised when she lifted her baton and the musicians, American and Japanese, played the Kimigayo. Protests came from the gallery gods, and for a few moments the members of the orchestra must have been puzzled, thinking there was a demonstration against them. Nor did the badly behaved audience stand during the national anthem played by the Americans out of courtesy to the people whom they had come to entertain.

The "hot orchestra," however, soon showed its mettle, and Miss Jaspar facing the audience, played a selection on the violin which brought hearty applause.

The "Silent Humorist"

Of the innumerable episodes of the "Hollywood Parade' which followed in quick succession, perhaps nothing was more acceptable to the audience than Eddie Gordon, called the "silent humorist," who performed tricks on a bicycle, wearing baggy trousers and Charlie Chaplin shoes. The Bicycle boys of Tokyo show their agility every minute of the day in the traffic laden streets, and the representatives of this brigade must have rejoiced at the solemn little man, who, without a word, put his wheel through astonishing antics.

Another feature of great interest was the Hollywood Studio Girls on rolling skates in quaint European peasant costumes, the color and rhythm being most effective. Ty Parvis and Myra Mason sang about roller skates as an introduction to a thoroughly sensational act.

Experts on Their Skates

Passow and his slight, blond wife, appeared on roller skates, but the audience was not prepared for the thrilling performance that followed as the two went through a fast and furious apache acrobatic movement. Each time Miss Lee came up smiling as though she were made of rubber and did not possess a spine.

The Hollywood Studio Girls added not a little glamor to the show under Ada Broadbent's direction. They are well disciplined and perform with a precision that comes from having danced together for a long time. Miss Pauline Guthrie, the prima donna, and Tommy Jones, the baritone singer, who rendered the Merry Widow waltz to the movements of the show girls, were well received.

Nimble Footed Dancer

Jack Lester was immediately a favorite with the audience. Weighing 200 pounds, his twinkling feet beat out a measure three times as fast as the music. That is why he is called "King of Triple Time Rhythm." In one of his appearances he brought a Japanese girl on with him and she soon proved that she was a good pupil.

Dave Hacker and June Sidell were acclaimed at once as good entertainers. Hacker is known as an eccentric dancer, but rather he might be known as a dancing-actor. He puts style and personality into his work. Pretty brunette June Sidell makes a good foil for her dancing partner. Ty Parvis and Myra Mason are another dancing couple who are often on the program.

It was interesting to hear Ty Parvis singing the theme song in "Sons of the Desert," the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer comedy now being shown at the Nippon Gekijo, and almost immediately after, with the rise of the curtain, he stepped out to make a personal appearance that had not been planned.

Sharp Shooter Expert

After Jerry Coe's dancing while playing on the accordion, and Anita Lou's astonishing acrobatic feats, it was exciting to watch Harvey Perry give a demonstration of sharp shooting. Looking the part of a western, deputy sheriff, his sure shots always went home. His wife smilingly assisted him. But when she put on a headdress full of white targets and her husband fired at them and got them all without killing his wife there was a feeling of relief.

After the Hollywood Studio Girls had given a "Neon Fantasy," carrying wands which showed up on a darkened stage as though a bit of the Ginza at night had been transferred to the Nippon Gekijo stage, the grand finale of the program came with the "Fountain of Youth," Lottie Mayer's famous disappearing water ballet.

Display of Water Babies

The deep tank was hidden by stage scenery, but looking glasses reflected to the audience the scene within as each of the 12 girls in the ballet plunged into the water. They came out in different costume, dived again and returned in bathing dresses. Then followed a diving contest which was almost as good as an exhibition at the swimming stadium in Tokyo. At the end one of the champions was lifted up on a trapeze to make a hazardous straight dive, and there was an ensemble of all the water babies holding miniature fountains that filled the air with spray.

Mr. Arthur Silver, the manager, spoke a few words before the performance began, and Mr. Suisei Matsui acted as master of ceremony, introducing the entertainers in his customary, humorous manner.

England Building Two-In-One Plane

Small Ship, Locked To Large One, Can Be Released At Good Flying Height

A strange composite aircraft which, it is hoped, may improve the organization of the transatlantic air mail service will be tested shortly on behalf of the Air Ministry and the Imperial Airways, says an article to the New York Times from London, dated Nov. 29.

Now in course of construction by Short Brothers, one of the largest seaplane works in the world, originators of all-metal flying boats, it consists of a big flying boat which carries a high speed seaplane on its upper wing, specially so secured that it cannot be released until flying conditions are such that the upper machine will lift itself clear of the lower.

The device is intended to put into the air a heavily loaded seaplane which would have the greatest difficulty in leaving the water by its own power only.

The combination will thus consist of a heavily loaded small machine and a lightly loaded big machine locked together by a patented device and capable of using their power jointly during the take-off. They will climb as a composite seaplane until the operating height of the small machine is reached and until sufficient forward speed is attained not only to allow the mail plane to fly independently but also to generate forces in the wings of the different sections to enable the planes to separate safely.

When that condition is reached, the pilot releases the locking lever, and the mail plane sails upward and away on its journey, while the "porter" flying boat returns to its base.

Invented by Major R. H. Mayor, it should, if it proves satisfactory, be of great importance in the evolution of transatlantic air mail, since it promises to solve the difficulty of combining long range with a reasonable pay load.

The system is said to be preferable to catapulting because it will put the mail plane into the air at operating height, thereby allowing the pilot plenty of time to jettison the bulk of his fuel if a forced descent should be necessary. It is also said to be an improvement on refueling in the air, which might be both difficult and dangerous in bad weather.

The project is confined to mail carrying, but is capable of militar as well as civil application. The Air Ministry is understood to be interested on both counts.

U.S. Army General Staff Ready For Emergencies

peace of an officer as a member of the General Staff Corps shall be for a period of four years, unless sooner relieved." His name must have been borne on an eligible list. Officers are prepared in the Army School of the Line, the Army Staff College and the War College for staff duty. So thorough is the training in these modern institutions that, if the American army officer is not the best educated of soldiers, it is not for want of a costly and elaborate system.

Since the National Defense Act provides that the chief of staff and his assistants shall be selected by the President 'from the general officers of the line," the implication is that he President is not limited to the list of major generals in naming a chief of staff. There are twenty-one major generals and forty-six brigadier generals on the commissioned list. Many of them on both lists have served in Washington and in the field as staff officers, and some of them have excellent Spanish War and World War records. When General Mac-Arthur was apointed chief of staff President Hoover stated that a point in his favor was that he would be able to serve the full term of four years. There were several other major generals who could have completed the term before retiring for age, but none of them was better qualified for the responsible post.

As chief of staff, General MacArthur has been indefatigable in advancing the interests of the army, bringing about the General Council, recommending the four army plan, giving close attention to improvement of munitions and equipment and carrying out mechanization with available appropriations. He has made several visits to Europe to study the armed forces of Great Britain and the Continental nations.

The Most Abject Surrender

After Hindenburg told the Kaiser that all is lost, William II boarded his special train at Spa on November 10, 1918 at 4.40 a.m. Half an hour later the Emperor left the train and boarded an automobile with Holland as his destination. He crossed the Dutch border at Eysden on November 10th at 8 a.m. Seeing a Dutch soldier loitering about, the Kaiser walked up to him saying "I am the German Emperor", at the same time handing the amazed private his sword.

A Japanese Commanded A U.S. Army

In July 1918 the United States and Japan reached an agrsement for joint intervention in Siberia, with the object of supporting the Czechoslovak army operating against the Bolsheviks in Siberia. The United States contingent was to consist of about 10,000 men while Japan was to provide an equal force, and the French and British participated with smaller units. By virtue of rank the Japanese General Kikuzo Otani became Commander-in-Chief of the entire expedition, which operated in Vladivostok in 1918 and 1919.

Australia Race Proves France Lagging In Air

The first was a single-motored built for a 300-horsepower motor, but tried with a 650-horsepower engine. The vibrations were so great that the plane could not be entered. The second machine was the Bleriot Sagittaire III. Its speed was 208 miles an hour over a short distance and was considered satisfactory. But according to reports, it was over-tested before the race and also met with an accident when landing at Le Bourget.

In military aviation the Nieuport 622 attains a speed of 144 miles an hour. The new Dewoitines is expected to fly at 222 miles an hour but it is not ready yet.

Mermoz Flights Outstanding

The only success which the French may claim now in aviation are the latest performances achieved by Jean Mermoz across the southern Atlantic in a Couzinet plane. This excellent pilot has now crossed the Atlantic eight times from Natal to Dakar, and his latest crossings have been as regular as flights of commercal planes transporting mail should be. So far the French have beaten the Germans in the South American field, and have maintained their prestige undermined three years ago by the bankruptcy of the Compagnie Generale Aerienne.

In the other domains, everything remains to be done. But the Melbourne race has at least made the French authorities and the French public aware of their planes' inferiority. General Denain, Air Minister, announced that at the end of 1935 France would organize an international race from Paris to Saigon and return. A year is thus given to French constructors to prepare new planes likely to compete successfully with machines like Comets, Douglases and Bellancas.

Republican Issue Splits Malanites

Party In South Africa Has Two Wings With Widely Different Views On Subject

BLOEMFONTEIN, S. Af.—Should South Africa become a republic?

For years this question has agitated the supporters of Dr. D. F. Malan, once a staunch political ally of the Premier, Gen. J. B. M. Hertzog, and now leader of the anti-fusion movement in South Africa. This movement opposes the political alliance recently formed by General Hertzog and General Smuts, when they decided to merge their interests into one big party.

Lately, two distinct wings have been developing in the Malanite movement. One stresses republicanism as an immediate goal and issue. The other looks upon republicanism as tentative, conditional and indefinite of fulfilment.

Dr. Malan himself and his Cape followers favor the more nebulous variety, but the Transvaal republicans, including the Calvinists of the Potchefstroom school of thought, and some of the extreme Free State republicans, have "plumped" for immediate republicanism.

"For Nationalists," Dr. Malan declared recently at Bandfort, "only two ways are open: the relation of South Africa to the British Empire must be clearly defined, particularly as to whether the British Empire recognizes and will sustain South Africa's right to neutrality, or, failing this, republicanism."

This reply, it is said, has started the more ardent republicans, who want a republic, neutrality or no neutrality.

In an interview Dr. N. J. van der Merwe, M. P., one of Dr. Malan's closest allies, stated that Dr. Malan's standpoint was not that the republican ideal would be sacrificed completely if South Africa's right of neutrality was guaranteed, but that if a policy were adopted making it impossible for South Africa to obtain neutrality, it would then become urgent and imperative to agitate strongly and immediately for a republic.

China Best U.S. Customer; Japan Buys 5 Planes

Nippon Dempo-United Press

WASHINGTON, Dec. 29—The Department of Commerce reported today that American airplane manufacturers doubled their export from January to October this year in comparison with the corresponding period of 1933.

China was the best customer, the report said, purchasing 127 planes and 14 engines, all valued at $2,882,809.

Germany purchased eight planes and 196 engines while Russia bought 346 engines but no planes.

Japan purchased five planes and four engines and Mexico 43 planes and 44 engines.

Lord Lothian Asks Anglo-US Accord

Tells British Parliament That Support Of Naval Pact Will Aid World Peace System

The further fate of collective peace is much more likely to be decided in the Far East than in Europe, according to the Marquess of Lothian, who based a speech in the House of Lords on December 5 on the then current naval negotiations in London said Mr. Charles A. Aelden in a dispatch to the New York Times. His article follows.

He assured the House that if the British Government would stand for the principles of the Washington Naval Treaty, which Japan was planning to set aside, it would have the support of the United States.

"Does this government stand for those principles?" he asked. "and if so, is it prepared to cooperate wholeheartedly with other powers? If it is, I believe any attempt to alter them by reversion to power politics will fail and that the collective peace system will have a vindication of far more influence in the world than any 100 per cent return to international balancing.

"If the British will take this stand, they will have America with them. But I should very much like to ask the United States definitely how far they mean to go themselves in making these principles effective. Our government should ask America that question

Russian Support Seen

"If we support these principles we will have Russia with us and she is far stronger in the Far East than she was even a year ago. We will have China, whose recovery from the chaos of the last few years has already begun, and I believe France and other signatories will also come in.

"The issue in the Pacific today is whether the collective system is going to prevail against the present attempt to destroy it. If power diplomacy succeeds there it will inevitably succeed in Europe afterward.

"If we can secure the active cooperation of the United States, as I believe we can, in vindicating the neutrality of the Pacific Ocean, we shall get rid of the chief obstacle to the collective system, which is America's present abstention from active cooperation in that system.

"The great failure of the present British Government in the Far East was that it did not cooperate wholeheartedly with the United States when Secretary Stimson protested against Japan's absorption of Manchuria. Now we have an opportunity to redeem that blunder, and if the situation is wisely handled it may be possible to restore in the Pacific a collective system strong enough to vindicate the principles set up in the group of Washington treaties in 1922.

"If that is done, it is not too much to hope for similar success in Europe and for bringing Germany back into cooperation with the other powers.

"The policy of the British Government in the next six months contains possibilities of great catastrophies, but also contains possibilities of tremendous success."

Assurances on League

Lord Lothian's speech was made in the course of a debate provoked by a question by Viscount Cecil concerning Stanley Baldwin's speech in Glasgow on Nov. 23, when he said the League of Nations would never have the force it should have because of the absence from it of the United States, Germany and Japan. Lord Cecil wanted to know if the leader of the Conservative party meant by that statement that the British Government was weakening in its support of the collective system of European peace set up by the League. He was assured by Earl Stanhope, as government spokesman, that no such inference could be drawn from Mr. Baldwin's speech but that on the contrary it was the often-declared policy of this government to support the League.

Isoroku Yamamoto, doughty Japanese admiral, has acquired a new status in the London naval negotiations, according to the latest explanation of the British determination to continue the talks regardless of the fact that they have yielded no tangible results.

Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald and Sir John Simon, the Foreign Secretary, look upon Admiral Yamamoto as a sort of hostage through whom they may eventually have some influence on the naval and military elements now dominating the Tokyo government. Hence they want to keep him here as long as possible.

Earl Beatty, Admiral of the Fleet, addressing an imperial policy group tonight, deplored the fact that Britain was not spending more money on naval defense and declared the American naval expenses were much heavier actually and proportionately than those of this country.

"I have no quarrel with American parity or the ratio of five to three with Japan," he said, "but our acceptatnce of fifty cruisers to do work requiring seventy was a grave and deplorable blunder which must be rectified at the next naval conference, if there ever is one."

condition. It is necessary for that purpose to consider means for the economic development of the farming community and for the furtherance of their purchasing power. The economic fortune of farmers, who form the majority of population, has a very great influence upon our economic life.

Must Reduce Tariffs

So long as free trade is missing from international relations, the recovery of economic prosperity is all but impossible. For the recovery of the world from depression and for the rectification of economic exclusivism, the United States of America will have to propose the solution of the war debts question by a rational plan of her own free will. The glimmer of hope for the final solution will thus be afforded. Mr. Cordell Hull, United States Secretary of State, is of the opinion that free trade is the only means for the emancipation of the world from the present economic adversity. The solution of the war debt question will be a sine quo non for the all round development of world trade, the regulation of tariff walls, the stabilization of international exchange quotations, and the establishment of general peace. Japan is ready and prepared to cooperate with all nations for this purpose."

Aid for League In Chaco Peace Offered by U.S.

Stands Ready To Share In American Conference At Buenos Aires

As Paraguayan troops continue their march against Bolivian arms, the United States on December 7 notified the League of Nations that it would co-operate with its peace efforts by full membership on the Neutral Supervisory Commission, and informal contact with the League's Advisory Committee, says the Washingon correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

In particular, the United States stands ready to meet "with a conference of reperesentatives of American states at Buenos Aires within one month from the date of cessation of hostilities, for the purpose of conducting negotiations looking to the conclusion of a treaty of peace." This statement seems to indicate that the Chaco war is entering a decisive phase, and that the problem now before the nations is to see that a fair and equitable peace treaty is negotiated.

Note From Hull

In a note to Geneva, Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, further reinforced the increasing contacts between the United States and the League. Replying to invitations from the Secretary General of the League, he stepped nearer Geneva then ever before.

However, today's decision fits into American traditional policy, for the Neutral Supervistory Committee, on which the United States takes full membership, is an all-American body. The Advisory Committee, on the other hand, is drawn from the whole League membership, and has exensive duties and responsibilities under the Covenant. For this reason, the United States accepts only informal co-operation, through Prentiss B. Gilbert, the American Consul at Geneva.

Yet this degree of co-operation is unusual. Hitherto most communication between such Geneva committees and Washington has been stiff, formal and marked by long gaps. Only on one or two outstanding moments has the United States agreed to co-operate with an advisory committee.

Hull's Note to League

Had the United States taken full membership on the advisory committee, it would have been tantamount to League membership. As it is, the informal contact which is to be maintained is expected to serve as useful a purpose in tackling the protracted and difficult Chaco war.

The peace-making committee is to be called by the President of the Argentine Republic, and he is to invite other American states, as well as a representative of the Washington Committee of Neutrals. Secretary Hull told the League "I am directed to inform you that my Government upon receipt of an invitation from the President of the Argentine Republic to take part in such conference will be happy to accept.."

The State Deparment's announcement of the note to Geneva today added:

"The assembling and functioning of the Neutral Supervisory Committee and of the peace conference of American States at Buenos Aires are, of course, contingent upon the acceptance of the recommendations of the Assembly to Bolivia and Paraguay, and the consequent cessation of hostilities."

This ties up any settlement by arms with the peace suggestions made by the League, and indicates both the extent of American cooperation with the League plan and a desire to bring about an equitable peace making.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Flood Of Molasses

In September 1911, Market Street in New Orleans suffered one of the strangest floods in all history. A reservoir holding about a million gallons of molasses burst and flooded the street to a depth of three feet all the way down to Lake Pontchartrain, where it mixed with the water and killed all the shrimp, sardines and other fish in the lake. All the houses and stores along the route suffered from a plague of flies, ants and cockroaches for many a moon until the sticky material was removed.

Turkey Orders More Schooling

Half-Day's Work System Being Considered To Aid Jobless Youth

Far-reaching suggestions for lightening the burden of unemployed young people were adopted at the thirtieth Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Istanbul recently, says the Christian Science Monitor's correspondent.

These proposals deal with education, professional training, the provision of more work and the placing of young people.

To keep as many young people as possible off the labor market, one of the union's most important suggestions is that compulsory school attendance should be extended. When these young people have completed their schooling, it should be possible to send them to finishing schools. Theoretical, as well as practical courses for professional training should, therefore, be provided. These vocational courses, it is suggested, should form part of the country's general educational system. If this is done, it is felt, the youthful unemployed will be able to mingle quite normally with other young scholars, and will thus be less likely to consider themselves as a class apart.

Planning Leisure

Nor should the organization of leisure be overlooked. Every kind of pastime should be brought into use. Pleasant rambles combined with instructional talks are suggested, as well as excursions, and visits to factories and museums.

While such aids all have their use, the union recognizes that what these young unemployed most need is work. This work, they hold, must be of real value to the community—otherwise the young people will not realize their own usefulness. But how should this much-needed extra labor be provided?

One of the best ways, the union suggests, is to institute the half-day's work system, or to have short shifts consisting of only a few hours. Work should be voluntary rather than compulsory, while spare time should be devoted to professional, physical and civic education.

Labor Camps

Borrowing a leaf from the Third Reich, there might be labor camps for certain classes of workers, subject, however, to their free consent. But the necessary discipline in such camps should on no account assume the character of military training.

To help the young people to find work, the official employment exchanges should have a special juvenile department which would keep in touch with the schools and the educational authorities. In populated centers, there juvenile sections might have their own workshops where the capabilities of some of the young applicants for work could be tested.

In accordance with the constitution of the Inter-Parliamentary Union these important proposals are now being examined by its 36 government members. They are also being studied by the International Labor Office in Geneva. The problem of the unemployment of young people is already on the agenda of the 1935 International Labor Office Conference. The Inter-Parliamentary Union therefore forwarded it its suggestions, which they hope the 62 governments represented in the Labor Office will eventually adopt as the basis for an international convention.

sale and distribution of pistols and firearms to criminals has become so intense that a number of earlier addresses on more theoretical problems dealing with sociology and crime have been scrapped for a hard-hitting discussion on this specific subject.

This behind-the-scenes development is in line with the careful planning going into the proper type of delegate to be invited to the parley. The conference is called primarily—not to tell the public what the Government can do in combatting crime—but to find out how far the public will co-operate in the suppression of crime, it is explained.

With this objective a number of big organizations have been invited to send delegates which at first would not be considered in this connection—particularly women's organizations; the National League of Women Voters; the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and the like. It is believed that these are made-to-order organizations ready to put on their annual club programs studies of the subject.

In particular their leaders are going to be asked to consider the blunt facts of what the unregulated pawn shop traffic in pistols, revolvers and automatics means in terms of human life and security. With an antimachine gun bill now enacted, the Justice Department is ready to renew its drive for laws curbing sale of smaller weapons, is learned.

Horrors Of War Are Pointed Out By Lloyd George

Says It Is Time Present Generation Should Realize Its Realities, Sufferings

Mr. Lloyd George opened at Dorland Hall, Lower Regent Street, in London recently an exhibition of War photographs arranged by the Daily Express. Mr. Max Aitken presided.

Mr. Lloyd George, who was accompanied by Dame Margaret Lloyd George and Miss Megan Lloyd George, M.P., said he felt a great responsibility in declaring the exhibition open and inviting the public to view those terrible pictures of war, according to the Times, London. He would not do so had it not been that he thought the time had come when the present generation should realize what war actually meant. Those who passed through its experiences were rapidly passing away. Anyone who wanted to realize how quickly that process was going on had only to scan the figures of the annual expenditure of War pensions. We were now getting into a generation who knew nothing of the War. He occasionally came across a young man of between 20 and 30 years of age and said to him, "You remember the War?" He had but the faintest memory of it. It was therefore vital that the present generation should know what war meant. There was a great Russian painter who about 30 years ago, perhaps longer, painted realist pictures of war. He did it in order to warn nations as to what it meant. He fell a victim of the Russo-Japanese War himself. He had to draw partly on his memory and partly on his imagination for the pictures. There in that exhibition they had got photographs of what actually happened.

When a war was going on they could not tell the grim truths. They must keep up the spirit of the nation. They had to suppress a good deal, often the worst. They heard of trenches captured, of strong points reached, of villages occupied, of guns and prisoners taken. There was nothing of what it cost, of what the men who seized those positions had to go through, and of what it meant for them for weeks on sodden ground, drenched and cracked by that withering fire. The story was told on the walls of that exhibition. Frightfulness was not peculiarly German. It was an integral part of war. Those pictures were not incidents of war but its essentials. It was part of the process of what was known as destroying the enemy's moral, of breaking his will. It was through that breach of horror that victory always marched to its end. He thought the time had come when they should let the present generation know what war meant. It meant to kill, to shater, to mutilate, to drown, and to starve. There were nations where millions were starved. We escaped it in this country, largely through the activities of men who Mr. Neville Chamberlain the other day said were almost forgotten.

Danger Of War

Was publication of that kind of ghastliness justifiable? Not if they were merely pandering to morbidity. If that were all, then he would say at once that there were no words strong enough to condemn it. If there were no danger of another war, of a repetition of those horrors, he would say: Let the unknown truth about the War be buried in the same grave as the Unknown Warrior. But was there no danger? He was not one of those who thought it was quite imminent. He was a little hopeful that it would be put off, but it was there, lurking on the path along which humanity had got to tread, and any moment it might spring upon us.

Had they read the speech delivered by Dr. Benesh, the Foreign Secretary of Czechoslovakia, or the speech delivered by the Prime Minister on Friday evening, full of gloomy foreboding? Personally he was not reassured by the Prime Minister's promise that he and Sir John Simon would do their best. There they had the ferocious grain of war just above the horizon. If they wanted to know whether there was any danger they should go to Lloyd's and ask what it would cost to have a policy insuring them against the risk of war for five years. Then, if they did any business, let them try Lloyd's again with another policy for the next five years. They would then know that the danger of war was a reality which they had got to deal with. In those circumstances it was vital that the men and women of the present generation, who determined the fate of Governments, should know what war actually meant and what it would mean. That was he was present to open the exhibition.

It was a cruel thing to remind them of it, and especially many people whose grief would be added to by painful recollections, but they must bear in mind the millions of young men now throbbing with life and hope who had got to be saved from the repetition of those terrible experiences. Did he say young men Children would be in the front line next time—the same bombs, the same exposives that killed and mutilated, and liable to be strangled with the samo poisonous fumes as their parents.

He knew it had been said in reference to something he had written to try to give the realities of war that it would intimidate youth, undermine their confidence, so that if the occasion should be forced upon us in the future for another great sacrifice for liberty or right or patriotism they would be weakened. People who thought that had strangely misread the history of humanity. Whenever a noble cause had been imperilled in the past men had never yet shrunk from the horrors of death or of torture to defend that cause, nor would they in the future. But they must take care that if that calamity over befel them it would be for an adequate cause. Humanity must not be rushed from motives of ambition, racial hatred, racial jealousies, and greed. More than that, they must warn the nations as to mistakes that had been committed in the past, the blunders and the stupidities, so as to prevent a repetition if they were ever driven again, by circumstances over which they had no control, to resort to arms. Human ability must not be sacrificed in vain. If young men were called upon to defend the right they must be given a fair chance.

Sir John Simon

Continuing Mr. Lloyd George said that he read a speech the other day by his old friend Sir John Simon. He was sorry he was too late to hear it. He was glad to find that on all sides it was regarded as a pretty regrettable utterance. Sir John Simon seemed to deplore the length of his (Mr. Lloyd George's) reminiscences about the War. He was not the only statesman who had written his memories about the War. He was about the fifth in this country. When Sir John Simon came to write his autobiography—and it seemed now to be in the fashion—he would have one advantage over the whole lot of them, when he came to the whole story of the War, that the more he compressed the better it would be for him. The smaller the chapter, the fewer the details about what he did as a politician in the War the better it would be for his fame.

"I wrote about the War with great reluctance," continued Mr. Lloyd George. "I put it off. I only wrote it under very great pressure, but, having written it, I thought it essential to tell the whole of the truth as I knew it without fear or favour, affectin or ill-will. It is vital that the nations and peoples of the earth, in so far as I may be able to reach them—and I am glad to say that I have reached a great many countries beyond this one without what I have written—it is vital that they should know, not merely to keep them off it but if they are forced into it to see that the blunders that were committed that cost lives shall never be repeated again. I should like to say one frank word about the suggestion that I ought not to have revealed facts which reflect on men who have passed away. I am sorry it was necessary. If that principle were accepted history could no longer be written or taught. Most of the generals of the world are dead from the remote past to the present days. There are only two or three of the great generals of this War who are still alive. Does that mean that you are not to tell them of the War, and, if you are to tell it, that you are not to tell the whole of it so that people should know what happened?"

Most of those who took part in Paschendaele had written their own story already. There was General Gough, who was in command of the most important Army there; General Charteris, on whose information plans were based; Sir William Robertson, who advised the Cabinet upon it, and Earl Haig, through his revised dispatches and the fuller account given through his private secretary. The whole story had been told by them, and they did not refrain from criticizing politicians—notably one politician. (Laughter.) Was he not entitled to publish contemporary records, records made at the time, in order to inform the nation and the world of the real facts of that dreadful tragedy? Why did he wait so long? Bearing in mind the responsibility on his shoulders during the War, it was especially incumbent on him when he came to tell the story to give as careful, accurate, authentic, and fair account of events as could possibly be given. It meant the perusal of literally thousands of documents. He had them for anyone to see who thought he had omitted one document he ought to have published. It meant a great many interviews, and it meant an old fellow of 70 years, who had never written books in his life, starting to write in his seventieth year—and that took some doing. He had no leisure to do it until the last two or three years. He did it as soon as he had the opportunity. Once he did it he felt bound to reveal the whole truth to the public and he meant to go on doing so right to the end. There was no crucial or cardinal fact which he had stated which had been challenged. He had received an overwhelming number of letters from those who were fortunate enough to survive Passchendaele who had told him that, so far from overstating the case, he had understated the facts.

If they looked at the photographs at that exhibition they would ask whether he was not right in doing his best to stop that insane horror which achieved nothing. He would say solemnly, on the eve of the commemoration of the great sacrifice, that he felt he owed it to the fallen to tell the whole story. The greater the mistakes made the greater their sacrifices and the more exalted the dauntless courage, the inexhaustible fortitude they displayed. If expectations were not fulfilled, if plans did not materialize, the fault was not theirs. They were commanded to carry out gigantic operations under impossible conditions, but they never faltered or fainted. Each time there were authoritative assurances that the plans were capable of execution on the Somme or Passchendaele. There were almost 1,000,000 casualties between the two and they never achieved their purpose.

Mandated Area In South Africa Votes For Union

Former German Colony Of South-West Africa Asks For Admission

A motion requesting that South-West Africa be admitted as the fifth province of the South African Union passed the Legislative Assembly, in Windhoek, South-West Africa, on Nov. 29, says the Christan Science Montor. 12 votes to six

At present the status of this former German colony is that of a mandated territory.

As the result of the recent elections, the United Party now holds a two-third majority to enable it to pass measures for a change in the Constitution.

Recent Movement

Although ever since the World War there has been talk of eventual incorporation in the Union, the history of the agitation for this development is not a very long one, the issue having come to life only two years ago when the leader of the United Party announced that his followers proposed to break the existing pact with the Germans and link up with the Union.

Up to that point apparently, the party had hoped, by concessions embodied in the pact, to walk hand-in-hand with the Germans up to incorporation at a much later date. The breach with the "Deutsche Bund" Party, due to Hitlerite activities, hastened the program. A disastrous drought, the collapse of the diamond mining, and an agitation among Union farmers to put an end to the free importation of agricultural products from South-West Africa all contributed to strengthen the feeling closer union was necessary.

Poor Section

The territory is poor. And, although the Union Government has lent much assitance, it is not surprising that a majority of the inhabitants have acquired a conviction that unless a great deal more backing can be secured the future is black.

Those who stood out against this view formed the so-called Economic League, to which the "Deutsche Bund" lent its support in constituencies where it was not running a candidate. Both parties have been heavily defeated at the election.

A section of the German population, which is bitterly disappointed over the election results, has suffered a further setback to their hopes by the decision of the Administrator to ban the National Socialist movement in South-West Africa and to request the National Socialist leader, Major Weigal, to leave the territory.

On the other hand many of the older Germany, in common with the Union Section, are relieved at this development and prophesy better relations between the different racial elements in the territory as a result of the action.

London Opinion

If South-West Africa can "opt" to join the Union of South Africa—and so enter the British Commonwealth of Nations—what is there to prevent, say, Holland or Denmark; or for that matter any country, from doing the same?

Such is one of the questions raised in London with the news from Windhoek that the so-called United Party had necessary two-thirds majority in the legislative Assembly, to vote for admission to the Union, says an article to the same journal from London.

It is admitted that the cases are not exactly parallel since Holland, Denmark and other established states are self-governing and independent, whereas South-West Africa is a "mandated territory," formerly a German colony," captive of the Union during the great war, and now administered as an integral part of the Union subject to the rules and regulations of the mandate held on behalf of the League of Nations.

The Fact Remains

Nevertheless, the fact remains that South-West Africa, though not independent, is not either South African or British territory. If it nevertheless has the right to vote itself inside the Commonwealth fence, then why shouldn't other outside areas follow its example?

Point is given to the query by the fact that there is already a pro-Commonwealth party in Iceland. There is also a growing community of interest between Great Britain and the Scandinavian countries, all of which are members of the "Sterling group" and have interlocking trading interests

It would be going too far to say that any of these countries is actually thinking of seeking admission to the British Commonwealth. Yet it is incontestable that the people of those countries could accommodate themselves to the idea as readily, or more so, than Irish who have elected a Government pledged to cut the Commonwealth painter just as soon as they can manage it.

Meanwhile, however, the proposal to allow South-West Africa inside the family circle is likely to hang in the balance for some time.

The first step is a formal request for admission from the South-West African Legislative Assembly at Windhoek, South-West Africa.

Gen. J. B. M. Hertzog, Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa, before acceding to such a request, would presumably have to satisfy both himself and the League Council that the transformation of a mandate area into a province of the South African Union does not contravene the mandate.

Already Citizens

Actually, the white inhabitants of South-West Africa are already Union citizens. But whether General Hertzog territory's being absorbed into the Union when the Treaty of Versailles deliberately avoided annexation of Germany's colonial possessions is another matter.

Another point which has to be taken into consideration is the feeling of the inhabitants. The United Party consists mainly of Dutch and English residents who number about 21,000. But there are also some 10,000 German-born inhabitants, and though most of them now have Union citizenship they do not want to enter the Union.

Germany's Darkest Hour

On Friday November 8th, at about 10 a.m. the German delegation headed by Erzberger and General Winterfeldt, faced Foch in his railroad car in the Compiegne Forest. The crushing armistice conditions were read and translated to the Germans. When the Germans asked for a continuation of the negotiations, Foch replied that there was nothing to argue about. "You may accept or refuse," he said, "there is no third alternative." Then pulling out his watch the Marshal said: "It is now 11 a.m. November 8th. I'll give you exactly 72 hours or until Nov. 11th at 11 a.m. to make up your mind." Two days later the Germans yielded and that is why the Armistice began on November 11th at 11 a.m., although it was signed at 5.12 in the morning.

NRA Is Astounded At Great Incomes

Denies Recovery Responsible For Larger Million-Dollar Class

Those who would distribute the nation's wealth differently found new stimulus today in the Treasury figures showing an increase in the million-dollar class in 1933 and a sharp decline in the number of persons with net incomes up to $5000, says tn article in the Christian Science Montor dated Dec. 12.

Though the connection at NRA is that this rerovery unit is not responsible for the change Senator William E. Borah (R), of Idaho, asserted he would renew the fight to restore operation of the antitrust laws.

"The day of reckoning is coming," he said.

Senator Elmer Thomas (D) of Oklahoma, said the figures showed the need for further devaluation of the dollar, while others took them as indicating the necessity for more vigorous prosecution of the Administration's recovery efforts.

Hinting at some drastic federal action, Senator Burton K. Wheeler (D), of Montana, said:

Possible Golden Age

"If business leaders cannot help in a movement to get a better distribution of income than this, two years hence they may be looking back on the present Administration as their golden age."

Senator Borah said it was "quite evident that this is another proof of the power of monopoly and that the little fellow is being more and more chiseled out."

"The monopolies," he added, "are still ranking off and gathering in the dimes and quarters of the poor and putting them into the coffers of the wealthier.

"I have never been able to accept the view of taking from those who have not and giving it to those who have."

Senator Edward P. Costigan (D) of Colorado, was not surprised at the trend shown by the tax returns.

"Such a result is to be expected," he said, "particularly in a period of frozen credits and widespread unemployment. At such a time only those with financial resources are able to take and hold the country's valuable assets.

Wealth In Bonds

"Here is proof, as strong as any yet advanced, of the need for hastening by every practicable means the success of our National Recovery program."

Senator Thomas said the figures showed conclusively that the "rich have their wealth in government bonds and the interest is paid promptly."

"They have a regular income and are able to report it promptly," he added. "The common people have no business and their income is diminished if not vanished altogether."

The Oklahoman said redistribution of wealth "can be attained best by further decreasing the gold content of the dollar and thus taking the advantage of greater purchasing power from the creditor to the debtor class."

Commons Warned Germany Is Peril

Baldwin And Churchill Tell Of Need For Keeping Ahead In Arms, Especially In Air

The British Parliament had another of its periodic debates on national defense on Nov. 28, but this one was illuminated with a new realism and blunt outspokeness, says Charles A. Selden in the New York Times.

There were no vague references to an unmentioned potential enemy, but Germany was specifically named as the one nation that Great Britain now fears as a menace. Whereas last March, Stanley Baldwin, Lord President of the Council, said Britain would no longer be inferior in her air force to any power within striking distance of the British coast, he said on that day that Britain would not become inferior in her air force to Germany.

Govt. Welcomed Debate

This debate was based on an amendment by Winston Churchill to the address in reply to the King's speech to the effect that the national defense, and especially that in the air, was no longer adequate. Technically, it was a motion of criticism of the government's policy, but it was welcomed by the government as an opportunity for saying what Mr. Baldwin admitted would have had to be said soon under any circumstances. So the debate developed no antagonism between the Cabinet and Mr. Churchill's die-hard Tory following.

The only point of disagreement was concerning the rate at which Germany was arming. Mr. Churchill said that at the present rate of aircraft building by the two countries, Germany would equal Britain next year and would be 50 per cent stronger in 1936 and twice as strong in 1937.

Still Leads In Air Strength

Mr. Baldwin denied that and said that while the danger was grave, the reports of Germany's aircraft construction were greatly exaggerated. He declared that Germany's present air force was not half that of Britain and that next year this country would still have a margin of 50 per cent.

More specifically, Mr. Baldwin said that according to the British Government's present information from reliable authorities, Germany now had at least 600 military planes and possibly had 1,000. Both Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Churchill expressed the belief that there was no immediate danger of war.

Italy Will Seize External Credits Held By Citizens

Drastic Orders Issued To Halt Outflow Of Gold And The Decline Of The Lira

A grave threat to the lira's stability through the heavy drain on the Bank of Ital's gold reserves that has been going on with a constantly accelerated movement for the last few months has induced the Italian government to adopt a series of drastic measures, according to a dispatch on December 8 by Mr. Arnaldo Cortesi from Rome to the New York Times. His article follows.

These are designed to mobilize all credits held abroad by Italian citizens. It is a desperate effort to tide over the present critical moment and prevent a fall in Italian currency, which a number of ominous signs seemed to indicate was imminent.

Regulations Decreed

A Cabinet Council this morning, presided over by Premier Mussolini, approved a number of decrees providing:

First—All Italian banks, bankers, companies and other legally constituted bodies having their seats in Italy or Italian colonial possessions shall within ten days from today cede to the National Exchange Institute all their foreign credits. If required, these credits will be sold and transferred to the institute at the current rate of exchange for liquid credits.

Second—All Italian citizens residing in Italy or her colonial possessions shall before Dec. 31 declare to the Bank of Italy any credits they have outside of Italy or her colonial possessions.

Third—All Italian citizens and all banks, bankers and companies having seats in Italy or her possessions shall before Dec. 31 declare to the Bank of Italy any foreign or Italian securities that they possess, even if these are deposited abroad.

Fourth—Any one infringing these regulations will, in addition to the penalities laid down in the common law, be punishable by confinement for a period of years on the penal island, by a fine equal to value of the credits or securities he has not declared and by other imprisonment.

Blanket Provision Made

Fifth—All foreign currencies, credits and generally all means that may be used for payments outside of Italy shall be ceded to the National Exchange Institute, to which is reserved a monopoly in dealing with such means in effecting payments outside of Italy.

Sixth—The government is empowered to apply special "compensation taxes" to goods coming from countries that extend less liberal tariff treatment to Italian goods than to goods imported from other States.

Severe penalties are fixed for banks and credit institutions that do not keep their books and correspondence in order in regard to payments abroad and dealings in foreign currencies.

It is emphasized that the forced conversion into lire applies at present only to Italian credits abroad. For securities held abroad by Italians today's decrees provide only that they are to be declared to the Bank of Italy.

The fact that the latter provision has been included indicates the government would not hesitate to apply forced conversion also to those securities, but, on the other hand, the fact that such a drastic measure has not yet been taken shows the government hopes it will be able to control the situation without taking such a step.

The Sum Involved

The mobilization of Italian credits abroad as provided for by the decrees will place a sum estimated at between 3,000,000,000 and 6,00,000,000 lire in foreign currencies at the disposal of the government.

According to current reports, the government has no intention of calling for the immediate transfer to the National Exchange Institute of this sum for the purpose of increasing Italy's gold reserves, but will use Italian credits abroad as the necessity arises to make good the deficit in the balance of international payments, thus stopping the drain on the Bank of Italy's gold reserves.

How large a part of the total Italian credits abroad will be used in this supreme effort to safeguard the stability of the lira will depend how the future situation develops.

The Cabinet's action comes at the end of a week of persistent rumors that the government might be obliged even against its will to abandon the lira's present gold parity. Such a step had seemed inevitable to many impartial observers owing to the steadily declining gold reserves of the Bank of Italy, which have now reached a point dangerously close to the minimum established by law.

Up to the latter part of November these gold reserves had fallen about 1,000,000,000 lire from the total in November, 1933, while the foreign exchange holdings had fallen about 300,000,000 lire. A Treasury statement this morning revealed that in the last ten days the reserves had decreased by 110,000,000 lire, while circulation had slightly increased.

700,000,000 Lire Owed to Italy

Therefore, it was evident some remedy had to be found without delay.

It should be noted, however, that the situation is not so black as appears to be indicated by these figures. About 700,000,000 lire is owed to Italy on the balance of international payments, but these sums cannot be collected by Italy because of exchange restrictions existing in many countries.

It had been thought in some quarters that the government might apply another cut in salaries and wages, hoping thus to lower the costs of Italian products and to improve the trade balance. Similar measures in the past, however, had not proved as effective as had been hoped. The benefits they produced were not proportionate to the sacrifices they entailed.

There are persistent rumors now that negotiations are going on among the gold-bloc countries and between them and Britain and the United States for simultaneous devaluation of all gold-bloc currencies. Perhaps, however, these negotiations—if they exist at all—have the object of preventing a serious slide in Italian currency in the event of its being forced off gold despite the government's efforts to keep it there.

Apprehension has been expressed in some quarters as to the possible reaction abroad to today's measures. Confidence is expressed, however, in official quarters that the government has the situation well in hand and that owing to the limited quantities of Italian currency held abroad it will be easy to repulse any speculative attacks on the lira.

Lloyd George's Recovery Plan Is Nearly Ready

Fiery Welshman Says He Will Launch National Revival Scheme Shortly

Mr. Lloyd George made a statement recently on his plans to bring about national recovery and prosperity, according to The Observer, London.

"My object," he said, "is not to establish or bolster up any 'ism'—whether it be Liberalism, Socialism, Capitalism, Pacificism, or Nazi-ism—but to put forward some concrete ideas for dealing with practical problems which effect seriously the well-being of the nation."

Mr. Lloyd George said that he would be ready to launch his scheme within the next few weeks. He declined, however, to give the details of his proposals at this stage. He preferred to publish the plan in its entirety rather than piecemeal.

"I wish," he said, "to start on the work of placing my proposals fully before the nation in time for the public to form a judgment upon them before the General Election, which is bound to come, probably within the next eighteen months."

Asked if the next eighteen months would be a period of vigor and intensive campaign, Mr. Lloyd George replied: "I hardly like to call it a campaign, but rather an appeal to all parties to give fair consideration to suggestions put forward by an old public servant as to the best method of securing national recovery and national prosperity in present world conditions."

Months of Work

Mr. Lloyd George pointed out that for months he had been in consultation with men of practical experience in all matters with which he proposes to deal in the realms of finance and industry. These men include bankers, economists, agriculturists, members of all parties, and expert workers in social and economic fields.

"I shall publish the whole details of the scheme within the next few weeks," he added. "I have framed them not as a political, and least of all as a party, stunt, but as a sincere contribution, after much thought, to the solution of the grave difficulties with which we continue to be confronted."

Mr. Lloyd George was asked if he had any feeling that we had reached an impasse in the way of reconstruction. "We are not making any headway in the task of dealing with the problem of unemployment," he replied. "On the contrary, if you look back over the past thirteen or fourteen years, you see that the number of unemployed has never sunk below a million. That figure has become, in a way, permanent. It has become higher than it was some years ago.

Roosevelt's Lead

"One thing of which I am convinced is that it is no use our seeking paltry remedies for a great and chronic evil. In that respect I think President Roosevelt has given the world a very wise lead.

"Pondering over this difficulty I cannot find that any real attempt has been made to grapple with it. The Government seem to me to be afraid of putting forward schemes commensurate with the magnitude of the emergency. They are always expecting something to happen round the corner.

"My object is to get men of all parties to think and act on broad and larger lines than they have done up to the present. This problem cannot be solved with mere partisan ideas. I am pleading for a national and not a sectarian solution."

Asked whether his plan would have any direct bearing upon the position of the Bank of England, Mr. Lloyd George said:—"I have always been in favor of national control of the Bank of England. Britain is the only country where we have not got control of what is, in essence, a State Bank. There is nothing revolutionary in that. National control of the Bank of England is an essential part of the scheme, but by no means the whole of the plan."

After pointing out again his desire that his scheme should be considered as a whole, he declared with some emphasis, "I am not putting it forward as a member of any party because I have taken no part in party struggles for the past three or four years, and I have been doing my best to give impartial consideration to the national difficulties."

When the interviewer observed that his scheme had been likened in one quarter to a "new deal," Mr. Lloyd George smiled and said, "I hope it will be a new deal for all classes of the community."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The X Bridge

The X shaped bridge over the Sarthe, at Mans, France, was constructed in 1897 by M. de La Noe, chief engineer. Its unusual shape was found convenient for the purpose of separating the electrical from the steam driven street cars. But the chief reason for the strange shape of the bridge was an intended tribute to a lady of the engineer's family, bearing a name (Xenia) whose initial was an X.

USSR Organizes For Literature

Gorky Heads Trade Group Promoted As Party Within Party

Formation of the new writers' trade union in Soviet Russia has been revealed as the beginning of an elaborate scheme to enlist and train all available literary talent among Russia's 165,000,000 people, says a recent article in the Christian Science Monitor. To make sure that present and future literary workers shall be faithful servants of the Communist Party, an organization very similar to the party itself is being set up among poets, novelists, dramatists, essayists and journalists.

The new trade union, organized this summer, is restricted to 1500 members, selected by a commission from those men and women considered most useful in producing the literature desired by Russia's Communist dictators. These 1500 men and women are entrusted with the task of "shaping the literature of the future, when world revolution will have brought about the final triumph of the proletariat."

Gorky Is Chairman

Membership in the union itself, like that in the Communist Party, will presumably be kept very small. Its chairman, Maxim Gorky, suggested that 1500 active writers will suffice at present as "masters of culture" and "engineers of spirit." Mr. Gorky drew up a "plan" for this vanguard of Soviet writers. He said Russia could hardly hope to produce more than five geniuses at one time, and perhaps 45 others who are "highly gifted." The other 1450, declared Mr. Gorky with gentle irony, are likely to be "people who are insufficiently attentive to reality, badly organize their material, and carelessly work on it."

All those in Russia who write or aspire to write professionally are to be brought under the influence of this trade union, which in turn is firmly controlled by the Communist Party through its monopolistic ownership of every means of publication. Obviously there is no place whatever in this scheme for any writer who holds or desires to express anti-Communistic views.

Like the party, the writers' trade union is organizing a group of candidates for admission, from which future members will be selected. It seems probable that the union, like the party, will be subject to frequent "cleanings," when members will be expelled whose quality of work has declined or whose "ideology" has become doubtful.

Henderson Pleads For World Amity

Great Commonwealth Among Nations Is Adocated By Nobel Prize Winner

Arthur Henderson winner of the 1934 Nobel Peace Prize, addressed a large and interested audience at the Festival Hall of Oslo University on December 11 on the need of the creation of a world commonwealth as the only alternative to world war according to a dispatch to the New York Times.

This would become possible, he said, only by a comprehensive system of supervision and diplomatic, economic and financial guarantees of the execution of a disarmament convention and a treaty of non-aggression, with a definition of aggression, linked with a sanctions system of the League of Nations.

The program's aim would be drastic international control of trade in arms, limitation of armaments budgets, reaffirmation of the protocol of Locarno, interpretation of Article XVI in the convenant of the League, creation of an international air police force and the internationalizing of civilization.

Social Justice an Essential

Another essential to universal and durable peace, the president of the disarmament conference declared, is social justice.

"If we contemplate as our ultimate end a League which controls the world's economic life and the world's armed forces, then we must say frankly that our ultimate ideal is the creation of nothing less than a world commonwealth. This in the long run is the only alternative to a relapse into world war.

"Psychological obstacles are formidable but not insurmountable. There is already a group of nations in the world between whom war may be considered as ruled out forever. These nations are the British Commonwealth, the United States and the surviving European democracies. I would add to that group the Soviet Union, which in its international policy has shown it is devoted to peace.

"Democracies stand for a certain view which is incompatible with war or with a totalitarian State. I think we must get the better of both those forces and subordinate them to a policy to achieve the common good through a world union on the basis of social justice, and I believe the League of Nations and the International Labor Organization are instruments for conceiving and executing such a policy."

Receives Great Applause

He received great applause as he concluded his speech with this question:

"What greater cause and more splendid adventure can be set before the youth of the world than the endeavor to bring into being the age-old dream of a great commonwealth of the world as the visible embodiment of the brotherhood of man?"

A warning against a too great feeling of disappointment with the results of the disarmament conference was given by Mr. Henderson at a dinner given by the Nobel committee in his honor. Proposing a toast, Professor Halvdan Koht of the Nobel committee said the whole of mankind was watching Mr. Henderson's work with the greatest anxiety, as it might decide the future of the world for a long time ahead.

In reply Mr. Henderson declared the present conference was only the first of a series of such conferences.

"Our greatest task is to create a new human mentality, and we already have made progress in this work," he declared. "The conference is still alive. Our ultimate end is to achieve peace and security, and it is of decisive importance that the first convention should be reached by this conference. If our work fails it will mean the end of our civilization."

Mr. Henderson was heartily cheered by a large assembly of dignitaries.

Fear Held Law's Weapon Against Crime In U. S.

Permanent Suppression Impossible Unless Political Pressure Is Removed

A declaration that until political pressure on law enforcement agencies disappeared and cooperation of all agencies of the law was established there could be no permanent suppression of crime was made recently by J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the U. S. Justice Department's division of investigation, before the conference on crime says The New York Times.

He said that the Dillingers, Floyds and Baileys were not Robin Hoods, but "vermin of the worst type" and that certain punishment was the only way of making the criminal obey the law. He pointed out that the conviction record of the Department of Justice for the past year was 94 per cent.

Mr. Hoover spoke quietly and without emphasis, but he was frequently cheered by the sociologists, crime authorities and lawyers crowding Memorial Continental Hall.

"Until political pressure is doomed and until there arrives a continual state of cooperation between all arms of law enforcement we must regard the eradication of gangs like that of Dillinger, Floyd, Bailey and others as transitory phases of a condition which can change overnight," he said. "These men, it must be remembered, did not spring full-fledged into the ranks of big-time criminals. Their beginnings were quite lowly, petty thieves, bootleggers, hangers-on of crime, each with that peculiar twist in his nature which sent him steadily into new fields of viciousness, a twist nurtured and fostered by one primary fundamental, a thorough disrespect for the law.

Fear Held Law's Weapon

"We must consider the psychology of the criminal. He rules by fear, and fear is the only weapon which can rule him—fear of the certainty of arrest and punishment. Theories may come and theories may go, but this fact remains: The countries which speedily find, arrest and adequately punish their criminals have few major crime problems."

He pointed with pride to the activities of the Department of Justice and said that eight months ago those men were not even permitted to carry arms. He paid tribute to the men who died in the service of the country in the crime war which has led to the breaking up of all but one of the most notorious interstate gangs.

"They were soldiers," he remarked, "fighting side by side with other honorable soldiers against an enemy of the people. Yet, soldiers though they were in the service of the nation, they fought without the supporting influences which are the usual lot of soldiery."

He stated that the families of these men receive no recompense as do those of soldiers and advocated pensions for them. He hastened to add that he was not pessimistic about the situation.

"I am here to report progress," he told the delegates, "John Dillinger, the flag-bearer of lawlessness, is dead, killed by Federal bullets. 'Pretty Boy' Floyd, who for years laughed at the law, lies in his grave, dead of gunshot wounds inflicted in open battle by our special agents. The career of 'Baby Face' Nelson is over; he died of seventeen bullet wounds while two of the finest men I ever knew gave their own clean lives that they might serve society by ending his filthy one. Wilbur Underhill no longer carries the name of the Tri-State Terror. He, too, is gone, as well as such men as Homer Van Meter, Tommy Carroll and others. That is progress."

Agents Specially Trained

He emphasized that no agent of the Justice Department is a "promiscuous gunman"; in fact "his instructions were all to the contrary," and he explained how the men are trained and the department functions.

"The new special agent in the Division of Investigation, college man though he may be, must start anew on a process of education," he said. "Under trained lecturers and teachers, he is taught how to ask questions, how to interrogate a suspect, how to watch for the tricks by which a man or woman may seek to cover a trail or make a getaway. He is taught the hard fact that a criminal thinks constantly of himself, and that he is willing to use every possible twist and turn to evade an admission of guilt.

"He must learn to take nothing for granted and to investigate every seemingly pointless hint of evidence until he has established its worth to his own satisfaction. He is given his hours in the Crime Laboratory, where he learns the preliminary tests for bloodstains, the primary methods of establishing identity in handwriting cases.

Pursue Crime Facts First

"He studies the science of ballistics—the makes of guns, their peculiarities, the necessity for careful scrutiny at the scene of a crime for the course of a bullets and the careful preservation of it, wherever possible, for comparison with the rifling of the weapons under observation.

He even learns something of moulage, or the making of plaster casts for use in establishing identity or the preserving of footprints or other impressions. In short, for eight solid weeks this man does nothing but absorb knowledge about how to be an investigator. We do not pursue men. We pursue facts, and until every fact has been gathered and confirmed no case is ready for prosecution."

League Fears Italo-Ethiopian Rift May Widen

Addis Ababa's Charges Of Invasion And Bombing By Italians Stir Geneva

Ethiopia has charge Italy, in a telegram to the League of Nations published in Geneva on Dec. 15 day, with crossing her frontier, attacking an Ethiopian detail without provocation and bombing two villages from the air, and, finally, with declining to submit the incident to arbitral decision as required by the League Covenant.

League quarters are fearful that the charges, which have been denied by the Italian press, may provoke a serious situation here, challenging the basic idea of the League system, says John T. Whitaker in the New York Herald Tribune. For Ethiopia, like Albania, is in the anomalous position of being a sovereign state, as a member of the League, and yet a country subject to private "arrangements" among the great powers.

The message from Addis Ababa, Ethiopian capital, said:

"The imperial government has the honor to inform you for communication to the Council and members, that on November 23 last an Anglo-Ethiopian commission investiating pasture lands in the Ethiopian province of Ogaden was prevented by an Italian military force from continuing work upon its arrival at Ualual, situated about 100 kilometers (62.1 miles) within the frontier.

Charge Towns Were Bombed

"On December 5, Italian troops with tanks and military airplanes suddenly and without provocation attacked an Ethiopian escort of the commission. The Ethiopian government protested in a note of December 6.

"Despite protests, Italian airplanes three days later bombarded Ado and Gerlogibi, in the same province.

"In response to a protest of December 6 and a request for arbitration on December 9 under Article 5 of the Italo-Ethiopian treaty of August 2, 1928, the Italian Consul disregarded the protest, demanded indemnity and moral reparations in a note of December 11 and declared in a note of December 14 that his government did not see how a solution of an incident of this character could be submitted to arbitral decision.

"In the presence of Italian aggression the Ethiopian government draws the Council's attention to the gravity of the situation. Detailed information and documents follow."

The first fear in League quarters is that strained relations along the ill-deigned frontier of Italian Somaliland may provoke conflict. For the Italians, here is a "Remember the Alamo" ring to the word Ethiopia, because that country's King Menelik, in 1896, killed 10,000 Italians in the Battle of Adowa, torturing thousands of wounded left by the routed army and checked Italy's expansion.

Declining foreign loans even in their efforts to maintain their independence, the Christian Africans of Ethiopia are alarmed, it is said here, by reports that the approaching Franco-Italian rapprochement will be based in part on a "free hand for Italy in Ethiopia." Ethiopia might provoke a conflict, it is feared, rather than submit to this.

Entering the League in 1923 with the avowed aim of protecting herself against encroaching powers, Ethiopia was forced to protest against an Anglo-Italian agreement in 1926. According to her, the two great powers had divided their spheres of influence, with Italy supporting Great Britain in "arrangements" for the upper waters of the Nile, and the British supporting the Italians in commercial concessions.

As in today's telegram, the Ethiopians in 1926 then invoked no article of the Covenant, but merely called the League's attention to a grave situation. The French had been alarmed by the Anglo-Italian agreement, but withdrew their protest after Great Britain and Italy dealt directly with the interested states.

A second apprehension here is a direct appeal by Ethiopia to a specific article of the Covenant. Such a step might embolden Albania to make a formal request to the League for internation which has been refused privately, and make it difficult to shut down a public discussion of the great powers treating fellow League states with such pre-war directness as the Italians employed last spring when they anchored twenty-two warships in the little Albanian harbor of Durazzo.

There is also the question of what position the Soviet Union would take.

A direct appeal clearly will be forthcoming if Ethiopia can prove today's charges. Article 11 makes it the friendly right of one power to call another's action to the attention of the Council when it threatens to rupture peace. Article 10 on territorial integrity requires all League states to guarantee Ethiopia against agression. The Italians, finally, might be charged with violating Article 12, which requires arbitration.

Italy May Bar Arbitration

Fear was expressed circles that Italy may refuse to recognize League jurisdiction in her dispute with the government or Emperor Haile Selassie I. League officials foresaw the possibility that Premier Benito Mussolini might follow the precedent set in 1923, when Italy refused to admit the League's right to interfere in her dispute with Greece, which eventually involved the Island of Corfu.

The present Italo-Ethiopian issue, nominally growing out of frontier clashes between Ethiopian and Italian forces in Africa, was attributed indirectly to the conflict of Japanese and Italian commercial interests in Africa. Because Tokio's withdrawal from the League on March 27, 1933, becomes effective soon. Geneva was following the African dispute with close attention.

A report that Japan plans to send a military mission to Adds Ababa to heighten the efficiency of Emperor Haile Selassie's army increased apprehension, as did the Ehiopian government's charge, contained in its telegram to the League reporting Italian "aggression," that Italy had refused to arbitrate the recent incident at Ualual.

(Rome's version of the clash at Ualual, in which 110 Ethiopians and thirty Italians were reported killed, said Ualual is on Italian territory. The border between Ethiopia and Italian Somaliland is in dispute.)

Takahashi Arrives At Peiping To Take Post

Nippon Dempo

PEIPING, Jan. 7—Major Takahashi arrived here at 10 a.m. today to assume duty as Japanese military attache, succeeding Lieutenant-Colonel Shibayama.

In a press interview upon his arrival, the Japanese officer expressed his belief that the National Government will always have responsible leaders take charge of the affairs in North China. The officer understood that General Ho Ying-chin, War Minister of the National Government and chairman of the Peiping branch of the Military Affairs Committee, would visit this city before long.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Air Pressure Experiment

A 7 x 17 standard six ply passenger car tire inflated to 35 pounds air pressure per square inch, will weigh 3-10 of a pound more than the same tire and tube uninflated as established by actual tests. Since under atmospheric pressure a cubic foot of air will weigh approximately 8-100 of a pound, it means that it is necessary to pump approximately 4 cubic feet of air to create a 35 pound of air pressure.

18 Times Around The World In St. Paul

I have traveled about 460,000 miles in 20 years searching for strange and unusual things for Believe It or Not, but in that time I have visited 178 countries. Gus L. Altier has traveled almost that far—437,000 miles—and has never left the limits of the St. Paul railroad yards.

Altier is a switch engineer on the Northern Pacific Railway, and his duties are confined to piloting his locomotive to and fro around the yards—but never outside the city, he sometimes travels hundreds of miles a day within the narrow limits of the yards.

Geology of Moon Being Studied By Carnegie Experts

Said To Contain No Air Or Water, Outer Layers Consisting Of Volcanic Ash

The outer layers of the moon consist of volcanic ash and pumice, possibly interspersed with other products of volcanic action familiar on earth. There is no air or water on the moon, and no life recognizable as such. The temperature on the earth's celestial companion passes through astonishing extremes of heat and cold during the lunar day and night, but a few feet below the surface the temperature probably is fairly constant, at about the freezing point of water.

These are some of the matters which have been definitely settled by the work of the "American Moon Committee," a group of scientists of the Carnegie Institution of Washington and its observatory at Mt. Wilson, according to a current issue of the Literary Digest.

Recently the results so far obtained were disclosed at Washington by Dr. Frederick E. Wright, geologist, and chairman of the committee. Further studies are being made, and results will be announced from time to time.

The committee has a unique task—the study of the geology of the moon. To the ordinary person, the moon appears to be an important astronomical object, looming larger than any other in the sky. But this is only because of its nearness to the earth. Astronomers hitherto have been inclined to ignore the satellite because to them it is so small, so obviously uninhabited, and otherwise so unimportant in the colossal scheme of things.

Galileo was the first astronomer to study the earth's satellite; it was one of the first objects viewed through his original telescopes. In 1609, he discovered that, instead of a slightly tarnished disk, as it appears to the eye, the moon is a round body not unlike the earth in general shape, and covered with mountains, craters which might be volcanoes, and large dark areas which he took to be seas.

Changes on the Moon

The idea that there were seas on the moon soon was disproved, but the possibility that there could be life on it received consideration until quite recently. Prof. W. H. Pickering of Harvard Observatory thought not long ago that he had detected signs of volcanic activity, and changes of shading which might have been vegetation, growing with astounding rapidity during the fourteen days of bright sunshine, dying out during the subsequent fourteen days of frigid darkness of the moon's month-long day and night.

The Moon Committee, appointed by Dr. John C. Merriam, President of the Carnegie Institution, received the task of studying the moon's surface in detail, to learn, among other things, whether such changes actually could be proved to exist, and whether there was evidence of present-day volcanic action on the moon. Members of the committee include Doctor Wright, Dr. Walter S. Adams, Director of Mt. Wilson Observatory; Prof. J. P. Buwalda, geologist of California Institute of Technology; Dr. A. L. Day, geologist of the Carnegie Institution; Dr. P. S. Epstein, mathematical physicist of California Institute of Technology; Dr. F. G. Pease and Dr. Edison Pettit, astronomers of Mt. Wilson Observatory, and Dr. Henry Norris Russell, Director of Princeton Observatory: specialists not only in astronomy, but also in geology, petrology, optics, geophysics, mathematical physics, and planetary and stellar radiation.

In studying the surface of the moon, the geolgist is confronted by conditions with which he is unfamiliar on earth. For example, the lunar surface is sculptured by crustal movements and other "catastrophic" agents, but none of its markings are due to the action of running water, erosion in the ordinary sense, wind action, or weathering. The pull of gravity is only one-sixth that on earth. There is no water, no ice, no protective blanket of atmosphere to soften the impact of the sun's rays, and prevent the escape of heat from the moon's surface.

The temperature ranges are extreme. Measured with a delicate thermocouple attached to the 100-inch telescope at Mt. Wilson, the surface temperature of the moon was found to vary from 120° centigrade (248° Fahrenheit) in midday, to 100° below zero Centigrade (148° below zero Fahrenheit) soon after the beginning of the lunar night. Sometimes the change was noted to occur, from the highest temperature to the lowest, in less than an hour.

Compared with mountains and craters of the earth, those on the moon are unbelievably enormous. The heights of some mountains reach 25,000 feet, while at least one crater is known to be 24,000 feet deep. These extremes probably are made possible by the low gravity of the moon, and the lack of air-resistance.

Materials thrown out from lunar craters would travel fifty to one hundred times farther than on earth. Particles with a velocity of a mile a second, approximately the muzzle-velocity of the "Big Bertha" gun which shelled Paris during the War, would travel about seventy-five miles, at most, on earth; on the moon they would go as far as 1,950 miles.

This helps to account for the magnitude and depth of lunar craters. Material ejected from them was thrown about the countryside, leaving the crater scooped out clean. Earth volcanoes continually fill themselves up. The greater part of the material falls back into the crater or lands nearby.

Dean Root revealed that the two William Liman Biddle memorial scholarships, one of which is granted to a senior and the other to a junior, have been won by Edwards B. Murray, '35, of White Plains, N. Y., and Gordon A. Craig, '36, of Jersey City. Carrying the most valuable stipends of all the scholarships, the Biddle awards are granted on the general qualifications of the Rhodes scholarship standards.

Murray ,who was elected to the Princeton chapter of Phi Beta Kappa in his junior year, is majoring in classics. He has won his letter in track and has been a reserve center on the varsity basketball team for the last two seasons. He prepared for Princeton at the Hughes High School in Cincinnati. Craig is a member of the Princeton School of Public and International Affairs and is manager of the varsity debating team.

1-2 Ton Of Mail To Australia By Air From London

Three Letters Addressed By The King, Queen, Prince Of Wales To Auckland

Of the total mail load of two tons which left London by air for the East on Saturday December 8, about half a ton was consigned to destinations beyond Singapore, mostly in Australia and New Zealand. Among the letters were three addressed by the King, the Queen, and the Prince of Wales to the Duke of Gloucester at Auckland. These were due for delivery on Christmas morning according to the Londan Times.

The first of the regular air mails for Australia was loaded in the liner Hengist at Croydon on Saturday in the course of a ceremony at which Lord Londonderry, Secretary of State for Air, presided.

The small special mail, which had been entrusted to Lord Londonderry, was handed by him to Sir Kingsley Wood, the Postmaster-General, who stamped the letters with a special cancelling stamp and sealed them in a blue silk bag bearing the inscription: "Air mail. First England-Australia despatch. Dec. 8, 1934." This was delivered in turn to Sir Eric Geddes, chairman of Imperial Airways, who saw it placed in the mail compartment of the Hengist. The big liner was then towed out of the hangar, its engines were started, and the assemblyo f distinguished people watched it take off and set course for Paris.

An Imperial Organization

Lord Londonderry described the air route to Australia as a really Imperial organization, shared between India, the Dominions and Colonies, and the mother country. It was a true sign of that Imperial spirit of cooperation which was an indispensable factor in the efficiency of our air communications. They had reason to be proud of the service which was now being started, but they ought not to be content to rest upon the present achievement, but must press forward to improve and strengthen it to meet the demands which would be made upon them. They had been told by some people that they ought to learn from other countries how to build aircraft and how to run air lines. As members of a widely scattered Empire the British peoples had their own distinctive problems and did not lack the ability or the confidence to solve those problems in their own way. He had no doubt whatever of the ultimate success of their endeavors. He hoped that the new weekly air mail would be a means of greater happiness and prosperity to those countries of the Empire which it had the honor to serve.

Sir Kingsley Wood, accepting the special mails, said the departure of that aeroplane marked the culmination of the endeavor and thought of many months, and it must be a great satisfaction to the organizers to see that concrete result of their labor. On another Saturday morning, 5½ years ago, the air service between Croydon and Karachi, the first main section of the present route, started. On that occasion the aeroplane carried about 8,000 letters. Now they were dispatching roughly 100,000 letters and 5001b. of parcels, making a total weight of approximately two tons. There had been a steady increase in the air mail traffic to the East since the service started, and the rate of increase had risen rapidly during the past year. He was confident that the forging of the vital link in the chain, represented by the Australian extension, would result in a rise in the traffic beyond anything they had yet experienced.

Message From Mr. S. M. Bruce

A message from Mr. S. M. Bruce, High Commissioner for Australia, was read by Mr. J. G. McLaren. He said every step that resulted in accelerating communication and travel between the Dominions and the mother country served to make closer and more real the union between the component parts of the Empire, for a better knowledge and understanding of each other's needs and aspirations must inevitably flow from a more speedy exchange of views and visits. Considerations of sentiment were reinforced by considerations of interest, working for the mutual good of all.

Sir James Parr, High Commissioner for New Zealand, said that was a red-letter day in the development of New Zealand, the most distant of his Majesty's territories, and therefore perhaps the most concerned in this business of speedy communications. His father, a lad from Nottingham, became in the early sixties a pioneer settler in New Zealand. He could only receive a letter from his motherland after it had traversed the oceans of the world for nearly four months. Now a letter was going from the speaker in London to his son in New Zealand by that air mail in 17 days. What a difference! And in a year or two the air mail would go from London to New Zealand in less than a fortnight. The advantages were as tremendous as they were obvious. In the great things of mind and spirit, mother and children would come closer together. In trade the air mail would implement and reinforce the great Ottawa agreements; and the cement of mutual trade would bind the Commonwealth closer and closer together.

Service To Canada

Sir Eric Geddes said that, to those who set out 10 years ago to build these Imperial airways, that day seemed like a dream coming true. Canada and New Zealand had still to be put into the picture, and, although he might be going farther than he ought, he felt entitled to express the opinion that those countries would be linked with the mother country by air before long.

Among those present were:—"Lady Londonderry, Lady Wood, Sir Philip Sassoon (Under-Secretary of State for Air). Lord Stonehaven. Sir E. Harding, Mr. G. Woods Humphery, Colonel T. M. Banks, Lady Mairi Stewart, Lieutenant-Colonel F. C. Shelmerdine, Mr. H. Scott-Paine, Lieutenant-Colonel H. Burchall, Air Vice-Marshal Sir Tom Webb-Bowen, Sir John Siddeley, Major H. G. Brackley, Mr. H. Oswald Short, Mr. D. H. Handover, Sir James Milne, Mr. C. F. Wolley Dod, Mr. J. S. Ross., Mr. C. J. Galpin, Mr. Ivor McClure, and Major D. W. Gumbley."

"The Hengist, which will fly the route from London to Delhi, is commanded by Captain L. A. Walters, with Mr. L. V. Messenger as first officer. At Cairo this liner will pick up the air mails from South Africa for India and Australia."

Freak Snowballs

An unusual scene was presented near Howe, Indiana, in December 1933, when, after a light moist snowstorm, the wind whipped up across the barren stretch and rolled up thousands of snowballs just as though an army of boys had rolled them ready for placing in the walls of a snow fort or intended them for use as ammunition.

The fall of snow was followed by a gale which gathered together wisps of snow and rolled them along until they became too heavy to move farther. The wind-made snowballs, some of which were said to measure two feet in length and a foot in diameter, were reported over a 40 mile area of Indiana.

CONCERT REPEATED

As many music lovers in Tokyo have expressed the wish to hear again the operetta, "Haensel and Gretel," which was given successfully at the concert sponsored by the Tokyo Women's club just before the Christmas holidays, the pupils of Madame Loewe-Netke have arranged to repeat that operetta.

It will be given at 7 p.m. Sunday, January 20 at the Imperial hotel auditorium. Reserved seats may be obtained from Mrs. Netke, Shiba-ku, Shirokane, Sankocho 225, telephone Takanawa 6896.

The pupils are arranging this concert as a token of gratitude and appreciation for the teaching of Mrs. Netke in Japan. Mrs. Netke came to Japan just ten years ago and nearly all the younger singers, who have a reputation in the music-world of this country, are or have been her pipuls.

DR. BADE VISITS JAPAN

Dr. William Frederick Bade, professor of Old Tastament literature and Semitic languages in the Pacific School of Religions, Berkeley, California, U.S.A., arrived in Yokohama on board the President Hoover Friday en route to Palestine, where he is expected to resume excavation work. He is accompanied by his family and assistants.

Professor Bade is an international authority on the study of the Old Testament, and has veen conducting the excavations at Jerusalem, dispatched by the Berkeley institution, since 1926. He is now the director of the Palestine Institute. He is on his way to Palestine for the fifth time for conducting the excavations in the Sacred City.

Dr. Bade is scheduled to stay in Tokyo for two weeks, during which he will make lectures at the Aoyama Gakuin, Tokyo Women's College, St. Paul's University and the Tokyo Imperial University, in addition to a radio broadcast from JOAK Sunday evening.

In an interview with the press on board the steamer upon his arrival in Japan, Dr. Bade stated that the excavation work in Jerusalem can be conducted only five months from March to July every year. His present visit, however, will probably bring the work to a successful conclusion, he continued. "Precious documents dating from 2,000 B.C. to 200 A.D. will be brought to the light. In Japan I will visit Nikko besides making a series of lectures," he concluded.

Changes Needed By Philadelphia Symphony

conductors serve for part of the season. The opportunity given "to see and hear at first hand other conducting traditions of the highest rank, and to listen to programs devised from other points of view and broadened in range and variety" strengthened the season, rather than weakened it, he insisted.

In a joint orchestra and opera program, Stokowski suggested he would choose the repertoire, conduct some programs himself, and select the conductors best fitted for the repertoire, as well as the stage director. Opera, he urged, must be considered from the artistic, not the business angle. "Even if we did so forget our character as to embark upon opera on the box-office principle, I suggest we should be in for a rude awakening."

Nor could broadcasting, in his opinion, "be regarded as a mere matter of business routine." He believed that the Philadelphia Orchestra had definitely lost ground in this respect in the last year, ground which it was imperative it should regain. He planned to investigate the possibility both of self-sustaining broadcast programs and of commercially sponsored programs. The New York Philharmonic Symphony, he said, received approximately $40,000 each season for broadcasting its Sunday afternoon concerts, and he had been told that a commercial sponsor was to pay about $375,000 for broadcasting the Metropolian Opera. (Inquiry at the Metropolitan in New York today revealed that, while it was not known how much would be paid by the sponsor, the amount to be received by the Metropolitan would be about $100,000.) With a good radio contract, Stokowski said, it should be possible to finish the season without any deficit, and it might even be possible to reduce the price of concert tickets. In connection with his researches in this field, he said that an article by him on that subject had been requested by "The Atlantic Monthly" for its January issue. He also dwelt upon plans for recording.

Discusses Relations with Executives

In the latter part of the letter Stokowski discussed his relation to the executive direction of the orchestra, and the need for close co-operation between the music director and the managerial executive. The conductor did not wish to "run" the orchestra in a practical sense, but he did wish to participate in the fulfillment of the program planned and suggested by him and adopted by the board "to the extent of advising and keeping in touch, in order that the spirit and policy of the plan may not suffer a change in the practical working out of it."

"The executive should be 'sufficiently gifted to understand the artistic and musical ends involved, and, on the other hand, throughly competent in the business field to carry out the agreed upon plans to the ultimate contracts or practical agreements' he said. 'It goes without saying, I think, that the executive should have no outside commercial affiliations."

The conductor closed by expressing a conviction that the Philadelphina Orchestra no longer was a purely local or a private institution. Its support, he remarked, came from its subscribers in Philadelphia and other cities, from its endowment, its records and its broadcasting. Thus it drew its support from all over the world, he said, and should minister to the world.

"To fail to take into account that we must administer the Philadelphia Orchestra as an agency in American life as a whole, as well as a Philadelphia institution, would be to blind ourselves to the truth," he concluded. "Whether we will or not, the agency which Philladelphia citizens once created for their own cultivation and improvement has become—as every other orchestra of competence in the country must become—an instrument of cultural significance to all the world."

Wiley Post Tries For Altitude Mark

Drives Plane To Height He Believes At Least 48,000 Feet

In a furious battle against major difficulties, which necessitated driving his plane, the famous Winnie Mae of Oklahoma, with one hand, Wiley Post recently made an altitude flight which may prove to have set a record. The barograph he carried aloft is now being calibrated in Washington, says the Literary Digest.

The flight began at Phillips Airport, Bartlesville, Oklahoma, and ended at Hatbox Field, the Army post at Muskogee, 110 miles away. The feat was complicated by the failure of the oxygen value which fed Post's special "stratosphere suit."

Demonstration of the efficacy of this suit was one of the features of the flight. The round-the-world flyer had been working for some time to perfect it. Shortly after he closed the helmet of the suit at about 20,000 feet and turned on the oxygen he observed that the valve was feeding too fast. Fearful lest the suit explode from the pressure, he was forced to work the valve by hand, leaving only one hand for the intricate task of driving the ship. After the flight he announced that the valve would be repaired at once, in preparation for another altitude flight in a few days.

Due to more pressing demands for his attention, Post was unable to watch his altimeter, and did not know upon landing how high he had been. He later calculated that he had reached an altitude of at least 48,000 feet. If this is correct, he has piloted the Winnie Mae higher than any other airplane has been ever gone. The previous altitude record was 47,352.2 feet, held by Lieut. Renato Donati of Italy.

Post's flight was made almost on the thirty-first anniversary of the first flight ever achieved by a power-driven man-carrying heavier-than-air machine. Celebrating the tremendous progress of aviation in the three decades since Orville Wright and the late Wilbur Wright achieved their initial success at Kitty Hawk, North Carolina, the anniversary was observed all over the country at 10:30 a.m. Monday, December 17.

Managers of 1,400 air-ports in the country cooperated with Eugene L. Vidal and Elliott Roosevelt, Chairman and Vice-Chairman, respectively, of the National Aviation Day Committee. All available air-craft at these air-ports took the air at the hour of celebration, circled over their communities, and returned to the air-ports for ceremonies. Army, Navy, and Bureau of Air Commerce planes participated.

The Tower Of Skulls

A few weeks ago I visited the Island of Djerba which is identical with the Land of the Lotus mentioned in Homer's Odyssey. It now belongs to France.

In 1560 when the island was under Spanish rule, a notorious Arab privateer named Dragut invaded Djerba, and defeated the Spanish forces headed by the Duke of Alva. The victorious Dragut massacred all prisoners, collected their skulls and adding them to those of the Christians fallen on the battle field, erected them into a Tower of Skulls 120 feet around and 30 feet high. 10,000 skulls went into the erection of this curious trophy.

Duchess Of York Attends Program By Girls' Clubs

the Board of Education, spoke of the importance of good health during adolescence and womanhood, because "only a healthy and educated people could be effective." For 25 years, he said, the Board of Education and coal education authorities had been engaged in physical training and the nurture and welfare of children in State schools. Education in health could be started in these schools, but it could not be completed without the help of volunary bodies, because it was not until after the age of 14 that the great problems of life arose.

Although the health of the women of England was good, it was not as good as it should be. There was an excess of sickness among insured women which was largely preventable; there was much more fatigue, weakness, and lassitude among girls and women than was their normal share; the great social prevalent among young women than disease of tuberculosis was more young men; there was too much preventable anaemia in girls and women; and it had been found by inquiry that among 12-year-old girls 42 per cent. showed defects of posture and carriage compared with 31 per cent. in boys of the same age. There were also the risks of motherhood, which were not being reduced as they should be in the light of modern knowledge.

There was one primary and fundamental answer to these problems. It was that they must train and educate their children in the physical art of good living, for their problems could not be solved without that. He did not say that Engglish girlhood was not still the best on earth, but he did say that there was indisputable evidence which proved that there was need for the national development of physical training, culture, and guidance for all girls of all classes in England.

These activities comprised the building of new Government and Municipal Offices, hospitals and schools, the provision of private houses, and of amenities such as sports grounds, etc. It is partly to be attributed to the fact that Manchoukuo until recently was in a very backward state, and partly to the influx of Japanese officials and employees who require in the rigorous climate of Manchoukuo a more substantial type of house than that which existed for the use of the Chinese population. The result has been that the cities are gradually being transformed into cities of a modern type, by a well-thought-out system of town planning.

In addition to housing and other building activities, great energy is being displayed in the extension of the telegraph, telephone and radio services, the establishment of water and sewage schemes, etc.

Some people may consider that a considerable proportion of this work is, strictly speaking unproductive. On the other hand it is necessary if Manchoukuo is to be transformed into a modern State. Although the capital cost must be great, and perhaps the pace may have been too rapid, it is difficult to criticize the authorities for their zeal and intiative in the development work proceeding.

Industrial Development

This is one of the phases of the Manchoukuo situation which is of great interest to British business men. There are certain directions in which substantial progress has already been made. The iron works at Anshan are already well known, and they are now being supplemented by the erection of an up-to-date steel works on the most modern lines at that place, which will have a capacity of 500,000 tons per annum. There is every probability that the development of the iron and coal resources in the neighborhood will be carried on energetically during the next few years. Other mineral developments may also be expected but until the mineral resources of Manchoukuo are more accurately known it would be unwise to hazard a guess as to the importance of the part which such developments will play in the future of the rountry.

When one turns to purely manufacturing industries, one finds evidence of activity in a certain number of industries. Cement, beer, flour, textiles, industrial salt, timber products, magnesium, alcohol, tobacco, petroleum products, and light engineering products are already being manufactured. This tendency is likely to be limited to cases where raw materials are available locally, or where no great capital outlay is needed.

In considering the possibilities of further industrial development in Manchoukuo, one must bear in mind three points:

(1) Manchoukuo is essentially an agricultural country, and it is believed that the authorities fully realise that the chief care for the future must be the development of its agricultural resources.

(2) The establishment of new industries will depend to a considerable extent upon the readiness of the Japanese to embark on industrial enterprises in Manchoukuo. We feel rather doubtful as to whether the Japanese will consider it wise in their own interests to foster unduly the creation of industries in Manchoukuo, except such as are complementary to her own.

(3) Finally, an important factor in the situation is the declared intention of the Manchoukuo Government to keep a control over the extent to which Industry may establish itself in the State, especially as regards the basic industries or those which are essential from the point of view of national defence. Such industries are subject to control and cannot be established with out the consent, and to a greater or less degree under the authority, of the Manchoukuoan Government. The idea underlying the action of the authorities is that Manchoukuo is a new country with only limited resources at her disposal, and that it is essential that her development should be planned on orderly and economic lines. One can understand this point of view and sympathise with it, but there is one aspect of this problem which have raised great diffculties for certain British interests. We allude to the difficulties which the Oil Companies are experiencing today in Manchoukuo. While we were in Manchoukuo this question formed the subject of representations by His Majesty's Government, and it is still in their hands. We do not feel, therefore, that it would be proper for us to attempt to deal with a question which has entered the diplomatic sphere. From the business point of view, however, we are bound to point out that if the British oil interests who have sunk much capital in Manchoukuo and have aided in the development of that country receive treatment which prejudices their interests, this will act as a deterrent to foreign capital—British and other—from embarking upon enterprises in that part of the world.

To sum up our impressions of the development work proceeding in Manchoukuo. No one can fail to be struck with the activity which is being manifested. We believe that development in the future will be chiefly in the lines of communication, housing, modern amenities, and mining. We hardly think that any very great industrial development in the ordinary sense of the term is to be anticipated in the near future in Manchoukuo, except for special products.

The Finances Of Manchoukuo

A central bank, entitled the Central Bank of Manchou, was established at Hsinking in 1932. It took the place of the four previously existing note-issuing banks. It has the sole right of issue, with the rights of coining money. The capital was provided, partly by means of a loan from Japan and partly from internal resources.

One of the first tasks which confronted those responsible for the financial administration of Manchoukuo was the substitution of a sound currency for the many and varied worthless notes which were previously in circulation. Progress was rapid in this direction, and today almost the whole of the various former notes have been redeemed an Manchoukuo has in the Yuan a unified and stable currency. The importance of this, both to the financial soundness of the country and to the well-being of the people, cannot be overlestimated, and it is indeed a great achievement.

With regard to the Government finances of Manchoukuo, it is true that the Budget is balanced, but it is necessary to make some qualifications with regard to the probable position in future. In the first place it must be pointed out that the Japanese Government is only demanding—and this is the first contribution so levied—9,000,000 yen from Manchoukuo towards the cost of Japanese military expenses in the country, which for this year entails an expenditure of 159,000,000 yen. Secondly, the chief source of revenue of the State of Manchoukuo is that derived from Customs duties, import and export. As pointed out elsewhere in this Appendix, the figures of imports into Manchoukuo have been swollen by the rapid development work which is proceeding, with consequent large importations of plant and other materials. These large imports may continue for a considerable time but they cannot be counted upon as a permanent source of revenue on the present scale.

Senators' Charges Stir Du Ponts' Ire

Return On $5,000 Invested In Directing Building Of Powder Plant Was A Fee

Charges by counsel for the United States committee investigating the munitions industry that the du Pont Company realized a profit of 39,231 per cent on its cash investment in the Old Hickory Powder plant during the World War provided a tense moment recently in the hearing, according to the New York Times.

His face crimson with feeling, Pierre S. du Pont, who was head of the company during the war, quickly replied with a counter charge that the statement amounted practically to an attempt by the committee to falsify the record, that the statement was ridiculous and of a kind that should have no place in any record of any proceeding.

Nothing in the record of the World War has produced more sleepless nights in the War Department than the long-drawn-out Old Hickory controversy, which started in October, 1917.

Plant Cost $84,000,000

The plant, which was the keynote of a hurry-up program to guarantee the United States and the Allies the necessary reserve of smokeless powder at a time when the war was nearing a crisis, cost the government about $84,000,000 and in the end was salvaged for less than $4,000,000.

Meanwhile, it became known that quick action is expected by President Roosevelt of the committee which he named on December 12 to draft legislation to "take the profits out of war."

In response to inquiries as to plans for the committee, Mr. Roosevelt said that he expected it to meet within two or three weeks and immediately begin discussions with Congressional leaders on legislation to be placed before the new Congress.

Bernard M. Baruch, former chairman of the War Industries Board, was named chairman of the committee, which consists principally of Cabinet members.

Negotiations Took Months

The Old Hickory contracts, three in number, reached the construction stage in the Winter of 1918 after months of negotiations over compensation and the form the contracts should take. Active were Secretary of War Baker Pierre du Pont, Daniel Willard, then chairman of the War Industries Board; General William Crozier, chief of ordnance of the army, and many other persons in and out of the service.

Finally, under a $1 contract, the government agreed to advance the cost of construction, and at the same time guarantee a compensation which was to be so much per pound of powder accepted by the government.

The du Pont Engineering Corporaton, with a capital or $5,000, was organized to build the plant and this $5,000 capitalization, plus the $1 construction payment, committee counsel said, was every cent invested by the company. The return on the investment was $1,961,000, he asserted.

A Service Fee, the du Ponts Say

The du Pont assertion was that the money labeled profits was in reality a serivce fee guaranteed by the government. After all taxes and other legal charges were deducted, the amount was declared by representatives of the du Ponts to be $281,194, and not the nearly $2,000,000 reported by counsel for the committee. When the transaction was finally closed, soon after the war, the company's net profits were less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the total expenditures, Pierre du Pont declared.

The committee quickly switched away from the 39,231 per cent version to the records of the transaction from its inception in October, 1917, to the salvaging of Old Hickory after the war.

The du Ponts' demand in the first weeks of the negotiations was for 10 per cent commission on the construction and 15 per cent on the operation returns of the plant. They were the agents of the government, and the government put up all the money, the committee pointed out.

The wrangle, which was to continue until the signing of the final and third contract in March, 1918, was in full swing in November, 1917, when the War Industries Board, headed by Daniel Willard, intervened.

Du Ponts Were Held Best Fitted

After discussing proposals for building additional powder plants, one of them to Old Hickory, and pointing out that the emergency required that the construction of Old Hickory be completed in the shortest possible time and operated with greatest efficiency, the board expressed the opinion that the du Pont Company was "in every way best fitted for securing this result."

In the memorandum to Secretary Baker, Mr. Willard said the board had reached the point where it was unable to agree with the du Ponts as to what would be fair compensation for the erection and operation of the plant, and suggested that Mr. Baker call the heads of the company to Washington for a conference and that "you say to them that the emergency nature of the government needs is such that you must insist upon their taking hold of the project without delay."

The du Ponts, Mr. Willard continued, were to be told to proceed as the agents of the government to construct, organize and operate the plants, aggregating a capacity of about 1,000,000 pounds a day, in "the shortest possible time, the government to pay every dollar of expense connected therewith, as the work progresses."

"They, the du Ponts, must of course be willing to accept fair compensation for their services, the government was perfectly willing to pay fair compensation," the memorandum said.

First Proposal Rejected

The War Industries Board proposed an advance payment of $1,000,000 by the government on account of net profit or compensation to the du Ponts over and above all cost of construction and operation

If, when the plant was completed, the du Pont company and Mr. Baker were unable to agree as to the amount of additional compensation to be paid, the question should be submitted to arbitration, the War Industries Board recommended.

This proposal was rejected by the du Ponts, who countered with a propositien which stipulated that construction profits should not exceed 10 per cent and operating profits 15 per cent. These, said Irenee du Pont, were maximum stipulations and were not to be interpreted as a demand. All it meant, the committee was told, was that in no case should construction profits exceed 10 per cent or operating profits exceed 15 per cent.

These profit maximums were approved by the du Pont board of directors on Nov. 28, or two days after the memorandum of Mr. Willard to Secretary Baker.

Pierre du Pont indicated that it was rather difficult to talk business with Secretary Baker.

"In one of my conversations with him, Mr. Baker said that in his opinion the time had come for the American people to demonstrate they would do things for themselves," said Mr. du Pont. "I confess I resented what he said. I thought we also were American citizens, but the suggestion was that we were some species of outlaws."

The du Ponts insisted all through the testimony that they did not hold up the Old Hickory project because of compensation guarantees, or the lack of them. All they wanted was a legal, workable agreement.

Colonel Harris Tells of Delay

Senator Nye turned to Colonel T. C. Harris, who represents the War Department at the hearing, and asked him what, in his opinion, really delayed the construction of Old Hickory.

"I think it must have been the differences between the government and the du Ponts as to what would be a fair profit," replied Colonel Harris.

"And this was at the most critical time of the whole war, and this project was being held up while negotiations went on," said Senator Nye.

"I would not say that it was the most critical time. That was reached a little later on in March," Colonel Harris replied.

Arthur Kornduff, an ex-Assistant Attorney General, who was for a time engaged in effecting the final settlements after Old Hickory was closed down, gave it as his opinion that many matters connected with the transaction should have been fully audited to determine whether or not the du Ponts were in debt to the government.

He said there was no hint of any kind during the investigation that the company was guilty or had winked at any illegal or criminal practices. It was simply a question of finding out if there were any errors in its audit.

A report printed in New York that the committee had decided to call J. P. Morgan and other officers of J. P. Morgan & Co. was denied today by Senator Nye, who said that whether or not the banking phase of the munitions industry would be delved into would depend on Congress.

If more money is appropriated, the banking phase will be investigated and all banking interests involved called to Washington to testify, he said. It also was denied that the committee had decided to call Mr. Baruch.

A Castle For 42 Cents

The Castle of Montmale on the French Italian border dating from the 13th century, was the property of the Marquis of Saluzzo, who surrendered it to a bank holding a 40,000 lire mortgage on the property. The bank in an attempt to sell it appraised the land at 10,000 lire while the castle's value was set down at 10 lire. This evaluation of the castle was later reduced to 7 lire (about 42 cents at the then prevailing rate of exchange). According to latest reports the Castle is still looking for a buyer with 7 lires. The Italian lira has since risen in value and 7 lire now equal 56 cents in American money.

The Blind Mountain Climber

Traffic in the city or the perils of mountain climbing hold no terrors for Ed. C. Robbins, editor and publisher of Portland, Oregon, for he is ably guided by his faithful dog "Trebia." The dog has been specially trained for this service by the "Seeing Eye Corporation," a company whose only business is to rear and train police dogs for service to blind folks.

In September, Robbins successfully negotiated the perilous climb to the top of Mt. Hood and back, his dog Trebia close by him every step of the way. Asked why he, a blind man, should want to climb the mountain, Mr. Robbins replied: "Why for the experience, man—for the experience."

Chicago Suitor Refused By Evangeline Booth

Evangeline Booth, 68-year-old new commander-in-chief of the Salvation Army, said at a meeting on Dec. 16 at Belfast, Ireland, that a Chicago man had proposed to her there recently, but she had turned him down. She said her suitor, whose name she did not give, told her the time was coming when she should seriously consider the question of marriage.

"I have," General Booth said she replied. "That is the reason I am single."

The Army leader also said she did not think much of present day fashions.

"I would back my bonnet against some of these postage stamp hats," she asserted. "They have their back to the front and the front to the back, so you don't know whether the wearer is coming or going."

BERNARD LEACH DISCUSSES POTTERY

Impressions of Japanese crafts after an absence of 14 years were given by Mr. Bernard Leach, international authority on handcraft pottery, in a lecture before the Tokyo Women's club Monday afternoon at the Y.W.C.A.

Since his return to Japan which he characterizes as his second home, Mr. Leach has spent about a year working in the kilns at Kashiko, a village noted for pottery, production. There he has shared a kiln with Mr. Shoji Hamada, famous for his artistic pottery.

Twenty-five years ago when Mr. Leach visited Tokyo, he never dreamed of being a craftsmen but he became interested in the art when one day in the capital, he watched pottery being made. The scene which he accidentally witnessed has changed the entire course of his life, he said.

"The movement toward handicraft in Japan coincides with that in England, France, and the United States," Mr. Leach declared. "It is a reaction against that with which the machine provides us. With industrialization, there is a spread of education. The mass becomes used to what formerly was reserved for the nobility. With the machine comes quantity rather than quality.

"With the machine replacing the handicrafts, quality is lost and in Japan this is more tragic than in any other country because it means that the people loose a birthright—their appreciation of the beautiful. Japan has long been the last stand from which waves of culture broke and spread throughout all Asia.

"But for 20 years, Japan has been enjoying a reaction against the machine. There is a difference between her craftsmen of today and those of 50 years ago for today educated men and artists are turning their attention to handicraft.

"Educated men are seldom craftsmen to begin with but during the last 20 years they have been turning their attention from painting and sculpture to beauty in craft."

Mr. Leach said that Japan has what other countries lack—a great spokesman of handicraft in the person of Mr. Yanagi who goes into the villages in time to save the hand processes from being replaced by the machine. He told how Mr. Yanagi had visited two villages where handmade paper was an important industry. Through his efforts, the villagers retained their old processes instead of adopting the machine as they had intended.

Mr. Leach declared that the Japanese spirit of the artist craftsmanship movement toward the traditional folk craftsmanship was the best in the world. In Europe, he said, there is not sufficient rich soil for handcraft but from the Japanese tea room has come a standard by which all forms of art are raised and motivated.

The tea houses, he continued, have fallen on evil days of conventionality but the fact that so many people know the standards of beauty in the utensils used in the tea ceremony, gives the movement toward handicraft a solid foundation. Europe has no such standards for judging beauty in pottery as have the people of Japan, he said.

Mr. Leach declared that the artist craftsman must work with the country people who know handicraft, helping them to create new forms which the present day demands. Just such a work in Japan means living with the country people and teaching them how, for instance, to put a handle on a teacup. At present they can not attach an artistic handle for they have not been used to handles—they cannot judge how it must feel to the finger or how it must look to the eye.

Mr. Leach illustrated his lecture with lantern slides which included a picture of an elderly woman, Mrs. Minagawa, who although she cannot write her own name, decorates as many as 100 tea pots a day with conventional designs. The movies showed how quickly she handles a brush. She has attracted the attention of many famous artists but none of them have been able to converse with her. Mrs. Minagawa just says, "I learned it from my father. He was an educated man but I'm not," and continues her rapid painting. She works 10 hours a day, gets about 70 sen for a day's work, is perfectly contented with her salary and, since so many artists have visited her, not a little proud. Young people have been put under her to learn her methods so that the art may be continued but such students do not stay with her long.

Mrs. J. D. Hitch, president, presided and Mrs. W. J. Davies introduced Mr. Leach. Miss Halsey announced that the civics committee had bought 10 warm overcoats and six dresses for poor children of the city. Mrs. T. D. Walser, chairman of the library committee, announced that the library will be open from 4 to 6 p.m. Thursdays from now on.

AMERICAN BRUSH WRITER

Although he has been in Japan only since August, Dr. Drew Kohler demonstrated his mastery of the Japanese art of calligraphy before a large audience at the Hochi Shimbun hall recently when he participated in a writing exhibition given by public of Mr. Hochiku Yoshida.

His participation in the exhibition aroused the interest of a large group of Japanese pupils of calligraphy who said they had never seen a foreigner enter such a contest. The young American explained that though he had been in Japan but a short time, he had studied calligraphy for about a year and a half under instructors in Los Angeles and that he had come to Japan to continue his studies.

As a child, he said he had been fascinated by the Chinese characters and had sometimes copied them, he now ruefully admits, upside down! Kohler attributes his skill in writing to his previous art training. He modestly disclaims any particular ability and says that patience and perseverance are more necessary than any innate skill and that anyone who can handle a brush and is willing to work can master the intricacies of the Japanese written language. He is now engaged in writing a series of articles on present day Japan for publication abroad. Mr. Kohler is a member of the Society for International Cultural Relations.

Roosevelt Urged Unity With Britain

Admiral Bayly Says In London He Insisted That Navies Cooperate For Peace

President Roosevelt was quoted at a London dinner on December 11 by Admiral Sir Lewis Bayly of the British Navy, retired, as having told the latter that it was necessary for the American and British fleets to work together to keep world peace, according to story by Mr. Charles A. Selden, which follows:

Admiral Bayly, who commanded an American destroyer fleet off Queenstown in the World War, was recently in the United States, where he was a guest of the President on the cruiser Indianapolis during the grand naval review off New York. He called his talk tonight, which he delivered to the Ends of the Earth Club, "A plea for England and the United States to show the world that our two navies are not competitive but complementary, and together from a powerful instrument for world peace."

Standley is Among Guests

Among the guests was Admiral William H. Standley of the American delegation to the present London naval negotiations. No doubt he wished the diplomatic representatives of the two English-speaking countries, as well as the navies themselves, would cooperate to bring an end to the deadlock in the current discussions over Japan's plan to terminate the Washington naval treaty for the sake of getting the right to fleet equality.

The situation that has now developed made Admiral Bayly's remarks tonight particularly opportune. They were in accord with the wish of many of his British hearers that their own government would not hamper its collaboration with the United States by spending so much time trying to find a formula to satisfy the Japanese.

"President Roosevelt, for whom I have had very great admiration ever since he came over as Assistant Secretary of the Navy to see his people working under a British admiral, talked to me a long time at the recent American naval review about the necessity for our two nations to work together to keep peace in a troubled world."

Then on his own account Admiral Bayly went on:

"Our two countries have the same ideals of liberty, justice and fair-dealing, and in great measure the same traditions, coming as we do from the same stock and speaking the same language.

"The time has come when England and the United States should show the world that our two navies are not competitive but complementary, and that the two together form a powerful instrument for peace.

Invitation Is Suggested

"A good gesture in this direction would be made by our inviting the United States to send over a squadron of five or six ships next Spring to pay England a week's visit as guests of our nation. During the last three years the ships of our North American and West Indies squadrons have received very warm hospitality at almost all the Pacific and Atlantic ports of the United States.

"Judging by letters and American newspaper cuttings our ships left a great feeling of friendship and good-fellowship among their American hosts.

"Our two navies worked together in 1917 and 1918 in perfect harmony and are ready to do so again should the peace of the world be endangered. During my recent visit to the United States I talked with all sorts of people and found a growing feeling of friendship for this country, and there has never been a time when it was more necessary than at present to show the world by example that it is a reality."

The Japanese laid the foundation today for added delay in the naval talks by announcing that they had asked Tokyo for further instructions concerning what their next London move should be. It is also reported that the British are about to propose adjournment of the negotiations over a long Christmas holiday but with a definite date set for reconvening early next year to continue the present conversations, which the American delegates consider hopeless.

The Americans would be glad to quit now if they could do so without appearing to retire before the others were ready to end the discussions. But they do not want to be tied down to a fixed date for returning to resume futile efforts.

On the other hand, the British are most reluctant to adjourn sine die, partly because they hope to gain their objective by keeping the Japanese in England and partly because a break-up now without any assurance of resuming would mean the failure of another international parley that had been held in London at the invitation of this government.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Rains of Fishes

Every July the residents of Yoro, Honduras are treated to an unbelievable freak of tropic storms accompanied by showers of fishes, some of which attain a length of 6 inches.

The scientific explanation is that Yoro is not far from the Carribean Sea. In this sea, water spouts are formed which are so powerful that they suck up water and fishes from the sea, rising high over the land in the form of a rain cloud. As the cloud bursts, the fishes drop to the ground. Sometimes the waterspout finds shallow water or swamps in its path. In that case the rain also consists of frogs and small snakes.

An 11-Year Winning Streak

Coach Frank Gross of the Berkeley, Calif., High School "Bees" has hung up a remarkable record for his 130-pound squad. Eleven years ago, in 1923, the Oakland Tech Goofs eked out a 3 to 0 victory over the Bees, but that was their last defeat. Since then the fast little team has played 101 games, and won them all, piling up huge scores and holding a few opponents to tie games.

Roosevelt Ends Cotton Curb For U.S. Farmers

tions will not be identical with the Bankhead methods of actual compulsion, the President indicates that restrictions would continue in these crops as well.

Thus ended Mr. Roosevelt's fall sojourn a Warm Springs. His farewell gift of cotton exemption to 600,000 southerners merely tightens the grip he already has on this broad and politically potent area.

There is no longer any doubt of the loyal support of the cotton belt, an important factor in Congress which the President will doubtless find useful. No more buoyant ending could have been given to his trip, particularly as a market increase in the price of cotton is expected from his bullish statement.

Boys Will Be Boys

James A. Farley was initiated to the swimming pool Cabinet yesterday and was the target for the hefty water-polo balls wielded with vim by the aquatic experts, from the President down.

"You see those bumps," the President told newspaper men, pointing to protruberances on Mr. Farley's cranium, which nature has ceased to thatch. "Well, those aren't bumps of wisdom."

The Postmaster General ruefully agreed. Henry Morgenthau, Harry Hopkins, Dr. Tugwell, James Roosevelt, are in the strong arm squad.

Harold L. Ickes, who has no desire to be a sportsman, kept out of the water—in company with Marvin MacIntyre, the President's secretary, who was almost ducked, clothes and all, because he completely and violently submerged James Roosevelt with a well-slung ball from the pool-side.

Between times, policy-conferences were in order, and are being continued on the train's slow trip north.

More X'mas Trees

Christmas will be celebrated more appropriately this year than in 1933 in thousands of homes in the United States if the number of Christmas trees used is any indication, says a Halifax report to the New York Herald Tribune dated Dec. 15. More than 200 freight cars, loaded with the trees, have left Nova Scotia this year. This is double the amount sent across the border in 1933.

Italy's Empire Outside Europe

Country's Colonial Possessions Make The European 'Boot' Seem Quite Small

Italian Somaliland, second largest of Italy's colonial possessions, recently received a visit of inspection from King Victor Emmanuel. The King's tour raises a question as to the relative importance of Italian colonial activities, says the New York Times.

"Italy ranks fifth among the world's great landlords," says a bulletin from the Washington headquarters of the National Geographic Society. "With nearly one million square miles under her flag she is outranked only by Great Britain, Russia, France and the United States. Italy's empire is not as widely spread over the globe as that of the other great landholders, for it is confined to Europe, North Africa and islands in near-by seas.

"Italy's colonial possessions have an area of about eight times that of he 'boot' and near-by islands which comprise the mother country. Libya, the largest of the Italian colonies, occupies an extensive area of North Africa, directly south of Italy and Sicily. It is made up of the two former colonies, Tripolitania and Cirenaica. Most of Libya is desert, punctuated here and there with oases. Nearly twice the size of the State of Texas, it spreads from the Mediterranean deep into the sands of the Sahara, where its southern boundary in some regions is not clearly defined. Many of its inhabitants (717,663) are desert nomads and traders who spend most of their time moving from oasis to oasis along the network of caravan routes. Along the coast irrigation has worked wonders, although at great cost. Lands once barren wastes have been nurtured into producing farms, and some of the sleeping towns have been awakened by a progressive Italian colonization program.

"Italian Somaliland is one of the three Europe-owned Somalilands—the other two belong to France and Great Britain. Most of the colony, particularly the northern and central portions, is sun-parched and barren. In the south, the Giuba (Juba) River, flowing down to the Indian Ocean from the hills of Ethiopia, waters a winding, fertile region through the Somaliland plains. In some places the fertile land reaches only a few hundred yards from the river banks, but in others it is several miles wide.

"Lugh, one of Somaliland's most thriving inland commercial centers, is 250 miles up the Giuba. It is outnumbered in population only by the capital, Magadiscio (29,000) where King Emmanuel debarked. Although Somaliland is not the largest Italian colony, it outranks the others in population. It has more than a million inhabitants.

"Eritrea, spreading along the sun-swept shore of the Red Sea, is almost the same size as the State of Pennsylvania. It is shaped somewhat like a lunt-topped paddle, The 'handle' is but 50 miles wide, while the bulging upper end, abutting the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, is 350 miles wide. Eritrea, like Northern Libya, is slowly coming to the front economically. New highways are being extended into many of its most forbidding, barren regions; a railroad now links the principal port Massaua with the capital, Asmara, 75 miles inland, and Massaua and other trading centers of the colony are showing new commercial life.

"Italy's Aegean Islands (often known as the Dodecanese) form the smallest unit of the colonial empire. They are a group of volcanic isles sprinkled over a wide area of the Aegean Sea near its meeting point with the Mediterranean. Some of the islands are so close to the shore of Asiatic Turkey that on clear days they can be seen from the mainland.

"Italy's colonial empire is young as colonial empires go. Libya and the Dodecanese Islands were occupied by Italy during the quarrel between Italy and Turkey in 1912, and later were annexed by treaty. Assab, Eritrea, is the corner stone of Italian colonization on the Red Sea. About fifty years ago the town was purchased by an Italian shipping company for a coaling station. By treaties, Italy acquired other parcels of the Red Sea coast, and in 1890 all of them were consolidated under the present colonial name.

"Somaliland came to Italy like a jigsaw puzzle. Northern Somaliland was acquired in 1889 by an agreement with Great Britain, Ethiopia and Zanzibar. Sixteen years later an area to the south was purchased from the Sultan of Zanzibar for $750,000. The tail of the colony, including the busy port Chisimaio (Kismayu) was leased to Italy in 1905, when the European powers held a colonial 'dividing party,' Italy's representative emerged with papers declaring Italy's ownership of the leased territory."

London Commences Electric Unification

Vast Reorganization Will Take Two Years To Complete

The biggest development in the distribution of London's electricity is under way, with plans for a vast reorganization of the distribution of elecricity in central and outer London. This undertaking is expected to take two years to complete.

At present London's electricity is supplied by a great many companies. Some supply direct current, others alternating current. Their voltages and their charges vary. For many years Londoners have felt the need for a more satisfactory service which would give them a uniform curent, voltage arnd charges, says the Christian Science Monitor.

When the present merger is completed, the only current supplied will be alternating current and there will be a standard voltage at a standard charge, which, it is generally anticipated, will be lower than at present.

As a first step, a new company has been formed—the Central London Electricity Distribution Committee, 1934, Ltd. Already, six of the largest London supply companies with a capital of £7,000,000 which have joined the scheme, will be co-ordinated and their resources pooled.

The change-over will be a costly undertaking. To switch over from direct current to uniform alternating current means new motors, new machines—expensive apparatus that must be replaced or adjusted. It may therefore be necessary to float new loans to acquire the various companies.

The six companies that have thus far adhered to the proposed distribution merger are already somewhat unified under the London Electricity Act of 1925. Under this act the London Power Company centralized its producing capacity in the London Power Company, which acquired their generating stations, plant and main transmission lines.

US Employment Fell During Nov.

Seasonal Halt In Public Works Added To Decline As Compared With October

Seasonal suspension of public works projects at the end of the outdoor working period contributed to cause a decline of industrial employment in November in the United States from the level of October, Secretary Perkins said on December 21, according to the New York Times.

Figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed 86,000 fewer workers employed during November in manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries than in October, with a payroll shrinkage of $3,915,000.

At these levels the employment situation stood about where it did in the Summer of 1931, according to Isador Lubin, Commissioner of Labor Statistics. November is normally a month when employment was reduced, it was stated.

Durable goods industries held up better than those making consumers' goods, reversing the trend of the last several months, the Secretary explained.

Non-manufacturing industries showed a gain for the month, partially offsetting the losses suffered in factory employment. Factory payrolls, however, showed the smallest decrease for any November since 1925, losing 2.5 per cent from October levels.

Farm Implement Sales Rose

Factory employment figures for November, showing a decline of 1.9 per cent from those for October, also represented the smallest November decline in six years, with the exception of 1932. The agricultural implement industry showed a gain in employment of 9.1 per cent for the month, and Miss Perkins interpreted this to indicate an increase in farmers' incomes enabling them to undertake capital expenditures of this nature.

With the experience gained during the Roosevelt Administration, the Labor Department was studying the type of public works program that provided the greatest labor per dollar expended, Miss Perkins indicated. In a general way, the department had decided that road work gave the greatest direct employment, with housing (small houses and small apartments) and soil erosion work next, it was indicated.

Housing led the list for providing indirect employment, Miss Perkins said, because structural and transportation industries were set in motion when a building was constructed. Soil erosion and roads provided much less indirect employment, but were considered works tending toward self-liquidation, she added.

By affording opportunities to communities to improve their economic life, these improvements established taxable values previously not existing, and, the Secretary said, revenue thus created for the State might be considered as wiping out the original expenditure in time.

Seasonal Gains Shown

"Seasonal employment gains were reflected by increases of 3.8 per cent in anthracite and 0.6 per cent in bituminous coal mining," Miss Perkins stated. "Employment in retail trade increased 1.5 per cent. The department, variety, general merchandise and mail order group showed a seasonal employment increase of 6.4 per cent, while retail establishments other than general merchandise showed a decrease of 0.1 per cent.

"Employment in the non-durable goods group declned 2.6 per cent and payrolls decreased 3.8 per cent, while, in the durable goods group, employment decreased 1 per cent from October to November and payrolls decreased 0.6 per cent. The employment index for the non-durable goods group in November was 92.5 and the payroll index was 76.7, based on the average of 1923, 1924 and 1925 as 100. The index of employment in the durable goods group in November was 62.2 and the payroll index was 46.1.

"These figures indicate that for every 1,000 workers employed in the non-durable goods group in 1923-1924-1925 925 persons were at work in November, while in the durable goods group 622 out of each 1,000 workers employed in the years 1923-1924-1925 were employed in Novber, 1934."

Proven Worth of the Graf Zeppelin

Much doubt exists, in the minds of both the public and aeronautical engineers, as to the practicality of the Zeppelin type of aircraft. Possibly that is because of the ill-luck several of the world powers have experienced with that type of craft. Yet, Dr. Hugo Eckener, one of the foremost advocates of air travel has set up a remarkable record of convenience and safety with his Graf Zeppelin.

The Graf has now been in service for many years and has never had a serious accident although it has made a world cruise, Arctic cruise, and dozens of other exploratory trips and has actually crossed the Pacific Ocean once, the Arctic sea once, and the Atlantic Ocean 72 times. She has just completed a third summer of successful air travel between Europe and South America, having made a round trip every two weeks for three years during the summer season. The Graf crossed the North Atlantic seven times.

Paradoxical Fireproof Man

Torak Michelle is a professional "fireproof" man, and for many years has given exhibitions throughout the country pouring molten lead into his mouth, burning his feet and hands with hot iron bars, and shooting the flames from a blow torch directly on his flesh. Yet, Believe It or Not, Torak finds it impossible to drink a cup of hot coffee, or take a bath in warm water.

Torak goes by the name of Chimingo Singhales when he is giving performances.

Austria And Italy May Support Archduke Otto

Vienna heard rumors that Austria and Hungary have agreed to ask Italy to support Archduke Otto's aspirations to the throne of the old Austro-Hungarian empire, says a report to the Christian Science Monitor dated Dec. 15 from Vienna. An announcement that Premier Julius Goemboes of Hungary again would visit Premier Benito Mussolini of Italy, following Goemboes's current conference with Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg of Austria, gave rise to the reports.

Monarchist circles believed that Schuschnigg, an out-and-out monarchist, had persuaded the hitherto anti-legitimist Goemboes that Italy's support for the re-uniting of the two nations under the Hapsburg pretender should be obtained.

Natural observers, however, said that they believe the rumors were another case of the wish fathering the thought, pointing out that difficulties in the way of Otto's restoration were numerous.

MRS. BADE TELLS OF LIFE IN PALESTINE

Mrs. William Frederic Bade described life in three small villages of Palestine before a luncheon meeting of the Women's Society of the Tokyo Union church at 12:30 p.m. today.

Mrs. Bade and her husband, Dr. Bade, noted authority on the Old Testament, are in Tokyo en route to Palestine where Dr. Bade will continue for the fifth year, his historically important excavations. He hopes this year to unearth rare documents dating from 2000 B. C.

Mrs. Bade told the Women's Society today about her life in Palestine from the women's angle. She described the Arab Christian village of Ramallah (horn of Allah), the Moslem village of El Bireh, and the Jewish village of Kalendia, which she declared represent the three civilizations of Palestine.

She said the Moslem village of El Bireh is the place known in the Bible as Beroth. It is the place where Mary and Joseph rested, according to the Bible story, on their way back from Jerusalem the time when Jesus, 12 years old, was lost. It was at Beroth they noticed he was missing and from which place they turned back to find him. A noted painting of this incident shows Jesus in the temple surrounded by wisemen.

On the spot where Mary and Joseph were resting when they missed Jesus, Mrs. Bade said the Crusaders built a church. She related how this church has since been demolished so that today, only an archway is left. Life in the village now centers around the spring near where Mary and Joseph were. On this spot, the Arabs have built a Mosque.

It is in Ramallah that Dr. and Mrs. Bade have lived and to which village they are returning, taking with them for the first time their children, William, 10, and Elizabeth, 12.

"Ramallah is 3000 feet above sea Mrs. Bade said. "It gets the sea level and nine miles from Jerusalem," breezes from Jaffa and at night, we can see the electric lights from Jaffa 30 miles away.

"Ramallah is lively because it is one of the few places in Palestine that has trees. During the World War, the armies destroyed the trees as they invaded and retreated. They cut the beautiful old fruit trees for firewood and as a result. Palestine is now a bare and rocky land.

"But the Turks and the European armies retreated so fast from Ramallah that they had no time to cut the ancient trees. This village is noted for its many churches. In fact, I think the college is over-religionized. It has the Greek churches, the English, the Roman Catholic, the Convents, and other churches including the Friends Mission which is really the center of the social life of the village.

"Children of all the classes attend the Friends Mission school for it is the only school there and the Arabs send their children to this school. Even the leading Moslem families attend the ceremonies of the Friends school.

"Living conditions are poor for there is a great shortage of water. Water is kept in the cisterns which are the most expensive part of every house. These cisterns have been hollowed out of solid rock and in them the rain water is stored.

"The houses are all of stone. They used to be square but since the people have learned that a round roof sheds more rain water than a flat one, the roofs are now built with a slight peak.

"Economic conditions are pitiful and there is little opportunity to get work. Women till the fields while the men sit in the coffee houses. In the spring and summer, the ground is very lovely with a green carpet of grapevines. The grapevines are not trellised for there is no wood with which to make the trellis, hence they creep about and spread over the ground, making a beatiful green carpet.

"The government makes it an offense to cut trees without a permit the poor burn shrubs for fuel while those who have a little money, burn kerosene," Mrs. Bade continued.

"There is such little opportunity for social affairs that much is made of weddings and funerals. At weddings, the grooms rent tuxedos although the remainder of their dress may be far from being in keeping with the tuxedos. They may wear trousers but more often, the native skirts. The brides of course are in native costume.

"The big entertainment at weddings is the dancing. Our houseboy was considered the best dancer in the village so he was much in demand when weddings occurred. The weddings come at the most unearthly hours—6 a.m. for instnace. Our houseboy was continually practicing—he just loped about the house but he was really very graceful.

"Weddings are accompanied by much feasting. A favorite dish is rice and lamb rolled in grape leaves and steamed for many hours. They also steam the rice and lamb in scooped out cucumbers and either this or the grape leaf method makes a very delicious dish."

Mrs. Bade said that the day begins with sunrise, which is 6 a.m. in the spring and 5 a.m. or earlier in summer. A noise begins that doesn't let up until long after sunset and the only thing to do is to start the day along with everyone else. She said when she was there, they had no electricity but she has learned that the house will have electricity upon her return.

Mrs. Bade told the society that the famous Jordan river is now supplying electricity. She said that though Arabic was the language spoken, English was very well known and even the shop keepers could speak it. Many of the people have been to America, not only to New York but many to California. They had worked as peddlers in America and had returned with what they figured were considerable fortunes, to become truck farmers supplying the Jerusalem markets.

Homes in Ramallah are clean for the natives have more money, more education, and more contacts with the outside world than do the people of El Bireh—the village of Biblical fame, which is just across the street from the village of Ramallah.

In El Bireh, the people are much poorer and their homes are dirty. Both men and women work in the excavations, the men digging and the women carrying away the dirt in baskets. In Ramallah, the women also work but only in their own fields. It is considered a step down in the social ladder for them to work for others.

In El Bireh, many of the children have eye trouble as a result of the filth in which they live. The glare of the sun and the dust of the streets also aggravates this eye trouble. In this village there are no schools and the position of women isn't worth speaking about, Mrs. Bade declared.

The people are very fond of sweets, fancy cakes and colorful candy concoctions which form a swarming place for flies. The men of the village are fanatical and are envious of the economic progress of the Jews whose property they destroy at the slightest excuse, Mrs. Bade related.

Turning her attention to Kalendia, the village of the Jews, Mrs. Bade said it is clean and neatly maintained. The houses are painfully simple but contain good books and good pictures on the walls. The yards have barbed wire fences and gates that are locked at night. The orchards outside the fences have suffered from raids by the Arabs. This village has no spring so the people must carry water from the excavation center some few miles away. The people are intelligent, keep good truck farms from which they send vegetables to the Jerusalem markets.

Mrs. Bade said that Palestine is getting a good class of Jews from Europe for the government has put a money requirement on entrance to the country. It allows a certain quota of laborers to come in every year but restricts immigration by the financial requirement which at one time was $5,000.

Dr. Bade, who is professor of the Old Testament literature and Semitic languages at the Pacific School of Religions, Berkeley, Calif., and Mrs. Bade will sail for Palestine on the President Johnson from Kobe on January 25, after having visited three days in Kyoto and three days in Kobe.

French Generals Ask Longer Conscription

Experts Believe German Army Will Outnumber France's

A campaign for longer conscript service in the French Army was in progress on Dec. 15, under the sponsorship of military experts who believe the German Army will outnumber the French two to one by next April.

Agitation for extension of the present one-year service was inaugurated by Gen. Rene Tournes and Albert Meissel simultaneously with recommendations by the army committee of the Chamber of Deputies that the 800,000,000 francs, about $48,000,000, emergency military fund be used immediately to arm French troops with latest battle devices, says the Christian Science Monitor.

General Tournes, in an article published in Echo de Paris, asserted Germany with only eight days mobilization could attack France's northeast frontier with between 50 and 60 shock divisions of 1,200,000 men.

By next April, he wrote, Germany's Army will total 600,000, of which half will be career soldiers and half well-trained National Socialists. France, on the other hand, the article said, has only 316,508 troops on its home soil of which all but 60,000 are untrained conscripts or colonial natives.

The Chamber of Deputies was urged on Dec. 14 to provide funds to arm France's troops immediately "on full fighting basis," when Deputy Marc Rucard presented the report of the Chamber's Army Committee recommending an emergency appropriation of 800,000,000 francs (about $52,800,000) for the army.

The entire sum the Government asks should be spent on "indispensable equipment for modern battle" within the year, the report contended, since "industrial mobilization could not give immediate results" in case of war.

Types of armaments needed were: Equipment indispensable for troops to hold their own in modern battles: armored equipment (gun, armored cars and the like); improvement and repair of existing equipment; completion of stocks of munitions and other war materials.

Message of Confidence

The Rev. Dr. Albert W. Palmer president of the Chicago Theological Seminary, at this morning's opening session of this interchurch conference called on the council to send to all religious bodies a message that would encourage the Christian-thinking people of the nation to lay aside their fears and misgivings and through the assertion of faith in God co-operate for the establishment of economc justice and world peace.

The message as proposed by Dr. Palmer contained a scathing indictment of war, crime, cheap literature, questionable moving pictures and gambling.

"These evils," said Dr. Palmer, "cannot be corrected solely through legislation. There must be in America and throughout the world a reaffirmation of religious principles."

Class Divisions Decried

The message laid before the council said in part: "The world suffers from class divisions and within the church we find the same drawing apart of privileged from underprivileged folk.

"The world suffers from race hatreds, and within the church we find that members of different races cannot meet on a plane of spiritual equality.

"The world suffers from the nationalism of governments that refuse to yield a particle of sovereignty to insure the closer unity and peace of the world, and in the church we also find a narrowness of sympathy and outlook akin to nationalism.

"Churches which remain satisfied with local or denominational success, in place of a sacrificial concern for the total Christian cause in the community and throughout the earth, make the Christian cause seem futile and feeble when it needs to be united and strong to bear witness against a secular and warring world.

"If the most menacing sins of our day are group sins, the evils that organizations do, then all the more should the church as a group embody and practice the highest ethics of group life. It must do so if it is to preach co-operation to business and peace to the nations."

In a similar vein the Rev. Dr. Albert W. Beavens, president of the council, stated that co-operation among all of the religious bodies was imperative if the blessings of a Christian world order were to be guaranteed to the people of the United States.

"The forces that are wrecking American life," he said, "are no respecters of persons; they do not avoid Presbyterians and attack Baptists, nor center on Congregationalists and ignore Methodists. There is no good strategy that will work to conquer them which should not be used by all.

"Our solution of the rural problem, our ability to meet the great tasks placed upon the churches in our urban centers, our fight against crime, the drink evil, graft, vile movies, filthy literature, race hatred, lynching, all these and scores more like them will be better met by a co-operative and unified approach."

Airplanes Pull Harder To Go Slower

An interesting paradox of aviation is the fact that when a plane is flying at a velocity requiring minimum power, an increase of power is required to fly at a slower speed. The reason for this is: At the minimum horse-power point in horizontal flight the throttle must be opened more, and at the same time the angle of attack must be increased to decrease the speed of the plane.

See the H. P. curve of any airplane.

Fast Clocks Of Sandringham

A tradition of the Sandringham Estate, England, is that all the clocks must be kept half an hour fast, and visitors invariably point out the incorrect time of the clock in the tower of the Little Estate Church. But that is just as it should be, according to the royal prerogative of King Edward VII.

Edward VII ordered the clocks to show the time half an hour ahead to ensure that his guests would be late for their appointments.

Colonel Richard C. Shaw, mining engineer, banana planter, soldier of fortune and editor of The Tombstone (Ariz.) Epitaph in the homicidal Eighties, died on December 20 of injuries suffered in 1929 in a taxi-cab crash at Broadway and Fifty-second Street. He would have been 81 years old on Christmas Eve, according to the New York Times.

In spite of a fractured skull, collar-bone and shoulder, the Colonel had defied the doctors and lived after the crash. He used to say he had edited The Epitaph—the name of which was not an accident, as its columns were devoted mainly to the obituaries of ex-gunmen—with a pair of scissors, a paste-pot and a six-shooter.

Colonel Shaw, who had made his home for the last nine years with his daughter, Mrs. Gladys Shaw Erskine, a writer, of 345 West Seventieth Street, was born in Hamilton, Ont., Canada, on Dec. 24, 1853. His father was of Scotch-English extraction and his mother was a Basque from the Spanish Pyrenees. He was a nomad by inheritance. He watched his family construct the first long cabin in the State of Michigan, without a single nail, he had said, when he was 4. At 16 he was already "on 'the plains" as a freighter, transporting supplies to trading posts in the Indian Territory.

One night, he had said, he entered a saloon in Abilene, Kan., to look for one of his half-breed freighters. Wild Bill Hickok, the Sheriff, was standing at the bar holding a glass of whisky in his hand. He was gazing dreamily into the mirror, which was decorated with cupids and floral designs. Suddenly, a man who had sworn to shoot Wild Bill at sight swung the door open, reaching for his gun as he entered. Hickok whipped out his own gun and without turning sighted over his left shoulder in the mirror and shot his man between the eyes. Then he finished his whisky.

Took Degree in Engineering

A life of crowded action was interrupted long enough to take a degree in mining engineering at Berkeley Academy, now the University of California. In 1885, at Los Angeles, he married Lena Leota Smith, a concert pianist, whom he immediately transplanted to the unmusical atmosphere of Tombstone, where he had been made superintendent of the Tough Nut Mine. Two nights after the couple arrived a stage robber was hanged by lynchers in the public square, a stone's throw from their windows.

When the Colonel accepted the editorial post in Tombstone he was not unmindful of its dangers. Like every one else, he carried a six-shooter, but he never use it; he defended himself by his wits. Once he downed a gang of cattle rustlers from the "Hollow" by sheer book-learning, convincing them that the phrase "inocuous dequietude" was not an insult. The Hollow boys, steamed up with whisky, accused the colonel of calling them names, but when he offered the dictionary as proof they backed down, grinned sheepishly and stuffed their pistols back into their holsters.

The colonel, who earned his title when he organized a group of miners and put down the Ute Indian uprising in 1879, also witnessed the induction of Wyatt Earp, "the lion of the desert," as Sheriff of Cochise County. Earp made a brief speech on this occasion. "Gentlemen," he said, "I aim to keep peace in Tombstone if I have to shoot every man in the place." He kept the peace. The colonel (on a press pass) saw Earp hold off a mob of 500 men who sought to lynch "Johny Behind-the-Deuce," a gambler and killer.

U.S. Giant Flying Boat Passes First Test Successfully

Craft Built For Transpacific Service To Carry 52 Persons

The largest airplane ever constructed in the United States and the largest transport airplane in the world tried its mettle successfully at Baltimore on December 20 for the first time in both the elements for which it was designed—water and air.

Reginald M. Cleveland of the New York Times gives the following account:

The huge flying boat, which is to carry passengers, mail and express on the new air trail which Pan American Airways will blaze early next year across the Pacific by the island route, soared aloft from the waters of Chesapeake Bay near the plant of the Glenn L. Martin Company, where it was built. It appeared to answer the controls like a pursuit plane.

"Fine and dandy," was the verdict on performance which W. K. (Ken) Ebel, test pilot and assistant after the silvery giant, which weighs 23,100 pounds empty, had been towed to her mooring.

It had been expected that Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh, chairman of the technical committee of the air line, would be on hand for the first flight. He avoided the publicity attendant upon the launching, however, and will pilot the craft on later flights when it is undergoing its acceptance tests for his company. He and his engineering associates are responsible for many of the specifications of the new craft and its two sister ships which are being pushed to completion here.

Tests Made in Thirty-Mile Wind

A northwest wind of about thirty miles velocity was whipping the water of Middle River, where the seaplane ramp is stuated, when the flying boat was put into the water for the first time. It was towed downstream, and then began a long period of taxying tests up and down wind, and in wide and then very tight circles. Despite its length of nearly ninety feet and its span of 130 feet, it appeared to have a very short turning radius.

Twice, while it was making close turns and Pilot Ebel was getting the feel of the craft, which was twice as large as any of the four flying boats he had previously tested for the Martin company, one great wing dipped its tip in the waves as the boat heeled. She was light, as she might be if driven to a forced landing at sea, carrying about six-tenths of full load, or weighing altogether 31,000 pounds, as against her gross weight, fully loaded, of 51,000 pounds.

L. C. Milburn, vice president of the Martin company, said, however, that the amount of heeling which the craft showed was permissible and that her behavior in taxying was fully satisfactory.

After about three hours of surface cruising, Pilot Ebel discharged six men of the taxying and mooring crew who were aboard. Then, with L. C. McCarty, co-pilot and project engineer; Phillip Doran of the Pratt and Whitney Company, engine expert, and Otto Jent, flight mechanic, and pilot opened the throtles of the four 800-horsepower engines in the wings. All at once the light touch on the water was broken and the ship took an unscheduled take-off.

Twice it broke water in this way and remained in the air a dozen seconds, each time until the pilot set it lightly down again as he taxied about three miles out into Chesapeake Bay off Millers Island.

Meantime the seagoing tug R. M. McLane and the cabin cruiser Murray of the Maryland State Conservation Commission had arrived from Baltimore bearing Glenn L. Martin, Swepson Earle, Conservation Commissioner; Commander N. L. P. Bellinger of the navy, who had cracked up without injury in a forced landing on the way over from Washington; W. I. Van Dusen of Pan American and a party of friends.

Overhead, Admiral Alfred Johnson, commander of aircraft, Battle Force, United States Navy, was circling in a black amphibian. Photographic planes were buzzing about.

The four controllable pitch propellers of the flying boat were speeded up and a few seconds later the craft was off and climbing. Mr. Ebel dipped her nose in salute as he passed the tug and then let her climb in a wide, swinging arc until he had about 2,000 feet of altitude. He made two flights of twenty and eighteen minutes respectively.

The new flying boat is capable of carrying twelve passengers, a crew of five and a ton of mail 3,000 miles non-stop. Or, if preferred, of carrying fifty-two persons and a cargo 1,200 miles in the South American service of the airline.

At present she will be fitted with overstuffed settees convertible into comfortable berths for twenty-four passengers for the transpacific service. There will be a big lounge or sitting room, with bookcase, table, desk and plenty of room besides to stroll about and look out at the scenery.

Still bigger flying boats are projected at the Martin factory. Plans are already far advanced, it was revealed here today, for a boat twice as large, having a gross weight of 100,000 pounds.

U.S. Post Department Digging Into Phases Untouched In Other Investigations

The Post Office Department of the United tates was delving cautiously but insistently recently into a field where three other federal agencies have refused to go—the basic cause of the loss of 124 lives on the Morro Castle, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Testimony at ocean-mail hearings on December 8 touched sharply on the wages paid to members of the crew of a ship which(according to postoffice contentions submitted at the same hearing, earned far more for its owners from ocean-mail contracts than it should have under the law, and finally turned in a net profit of $263,000 from its own destruction by fire.

More detailed facts on the wages of officers and crew have been promised by Ward Line officials for the post-office files on the case. The post-office contention is that such wages are below the scale established by the former U. S. Shipping Board as a condition for the awarding of ocean-mail contracts.

Verify Contention

Should the company's own figures agree with those advanced by the Post Office Department, it would substantiate the contention of Ward Line critics that low wages and substandard working conditions were the reasons for the "breakdown in the human element" which was found by the Department of Commerce investigation to have been responsible for the tragic loss of 124 lives when the Morro Castle caught fire.

In substance the general charge against the Ward Line is that while it was getting a large subsidy from the Government and was making a profit from this subsidy—a moot point denied by the line—it was paying wages so low and working its men such long hours that their morale broke under the strain of the fire and resulted in the loss of lives which, according to the Department of Commerce investigation, would otherwise have been saved regardless of the occurrence of the fire.

Peter J. Connolly, government attorney on the case, presented evidence at the hearings to the effect that the company's excess profits on its mail contracts covering its two de luxe steamers, the Morro Castle and the Oriente, total $597,000, approximately half of which was earned by each ship.

The further contention was developed that the Morro Castle had an actual value at the time of the disaster of $3,923,000, arrived at by a 5 per cent annual depreciation deduction from its original cost of $4,900,000, while it was insured for $4,186,000, a sum which has been paid in full by the insurance companies, thereby leaving the line with a $263,000 profit from the loss of the ship.

At the time, according to A. A. Blomquist, shipping board auditor, the line's debts exceeded its capital stock by $395,000, a sum which would be increased to $1,500,000 if the "good will" item in the line's asset column were written off.

Incidentally, relatives of the disaster victims have no claim against the line under an old Supreme Court decision, a fact brought out in the hearing.

The Post Office Department is not directly concerned with the burning of the Morro Castle, its primary object being the cancellation of the Ward Line's contract, which it claims has been violated. The contract runs until 1938. It began in 1928. The department is interested in wage conditions only as they bear on the contract, but if they are made official records, incidentally it will be the first time such facts relating to the Morro Castle disaster have become part of government records.

Until the postoffice investigation went into the Morro Castle case, there was no attempt on the part of any federal agency to go into the fundamental cause of the loss of life in the fire, regardless of the fact that the official investigation pointed sharply in the direction of labor conditions on the ship.

Explains Abrupt Stop

The Department of Commerce's steamboat inspection service explains its abrupt stop at the point of fixing the blame on broken morale with the claim of "no jurisdiction." The Department of Labor, which might conceivably have an interest in such labor conditions, also makes the same plea of no jurisdiction. Similarly, the National Labor Relations Board, which started to go into the case, dropped its investigation, and is doing nothing whatever to ascertain the facts regarding the labor changes.

It is felt in some quarters that the loss of life has been entirely in vain unless the Government carries the original investigation to a logical conclusion by attempting to determine exactly why the "human element" did break down. While the Post Office Department investigation will touch on some phases of the question it also lacks the "jursidiction" to make the complete study necessary.

The Inland Ship

Show boats are a popular entertainment with folks in the vicinity of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, but in Moberly, Mo. they couldn't have a showboat because there was no river, the town being about 25 miles from the Missouri. So an enterprising showman built an exact duplicate of a river boat on dry land, and runs a successful business even though the customers can't hear the lapping of the waves on the hull.

NRA Is Winning Europe's Respect, Says U.S. Writer

Growing Belief That New Deal Offers Best Hope For World Stabilization

An important element in Europe's relaxed tension as the year 1934 ended was the growing belief that the New Deal may succeed and that the stability of the Roosevelt administration offers the best hope for world stabilization, says Anne O'Hare McMormick Paris correspondent of the New York Times which follows:

This view, expressed to the writer in so many private conversations and official interviews that it echoes like the voice of Europe, indicates a remarkable change in the last few months in the European attitude toward the recovery program in the United States. This shift of mind, general enough to be reported as an event, is the first thing that strikes a returning American. It is most noticeable in Great Britain, least apparent in Germany and most significant in France.

Parity an Effect of Elections

It is not a conversion and has nothing to do with approval or disapproval of the policies. It is a difference in temper, partly an effect of the November elections, which were followed over here by a flood of reports, studies and discussions on what had happened in Washington to account for the astonishing popular endorsement. Mostly it represents an increasing respect for a national effort that even the skeptics are beginning to take seriously.

Last Spring Europeans in general knew little of the American experiments except that they were bound to fail. The friendliest observers held that what might work in the United States had small application here. Now they know more and are not so sure. The change is reflected in an altered tone in the press and in a mellowness toward the United States that a traveling American has not met for a long time.

In contrast with that of last year British sentiment now is so genial that it has the effect of a national policy—"the line" to which everybody adheres.

In France there are more reservations. Instinctively the French dislike bold experimentation. Particularly do they dislike a bold fiscal policy that leaves them high and dry on the gold standard. The financial mind is as powerful in France today as it was in the United States in 1929. French bankers get their start on events and policies in America via Wall Street and this is the view most frequently reflected in the influential organs of public opinion.

Financiers Encouraged

The New Deal has had a bad press in Paris. With few exceptions French reports from the United States were critical and pessimistic. Lately, however, the attitude has been distinctly modified. Financial circles are encouraged by the rapprochement between the administration and the American bankers to believe that the President and his advisers have become more orthodox in monetary matters and need support in their stand against further devaluation.

More important from the French viewpoint is the widespread conviction that if the dollar falls further the franc must fall, too. If the step that all agree is politically impossible becomes in the end inevitable, it is better to prepare the ground by painting a more favorable picture of the effects of American policy.

The shift in the popular view is more striking. Small provincial papers, representing the independent press of France, now devote a surprising amount of space to American events. In the airless, anxious atmosphere of a small-town cafe the writer overheard a group of shopkeepers discussing the series of lectures on the New Deal delivered by Professor Allan Nevins at London University. That excerpts from these lectures had appeared in the local papers was unusual enough. More unusual was it to hear provincial Frenchmen admiring President Roosevelt because he had gone out to fight the dragon, so they said, instead of waiting to be devoured.

Books on Subject Multiply

French tourists who discovered the United States this Summer are still making speeches and diffusing their impressions with marked effect upon the questioning mind of France. Books on the New Deal multiply. One of these books, "La Revolution Roosevelt," written after a trip to America by Georges Doris, is prefaced by an argument now current everywhere.

"The Frenchman at least," he says, "should observe the American experiment with special interest free from dogmatic passion. Is it not the only revolution carried on today with respect for the democratic forms and public liberties to which he himself is attached?"

This attitude is new in France and new in Europe. Among the better understandings so freely forecast for 1935 it is strange to find a strong tendency toward a better understanding of the United States.

Yugoslavia Denies Mass Expulsions

slavia, who have only the Hungarian Government's policy to blame for any unpleasantness they have experienced."

Deportations Are Halted

Officially Yugoslavia professes to disregard world opinion, saying in effect: "If the world does not like our methods so much the worse for the world."

The latest news belies this. In the official quarter where deportations are controlled, it was stated tonight "expulsions of Hungarians from Yugoslavia definitely ended today. If Hungary drops her campaign against us, Yugoslavia will not take further reprisals. We have even ordered the cancellation of those orders of expulsion that have been made out but not yet served."

The reluctance of the average Yugoslav official or politician to discuss the matter and his anger, if pressed, seem to indicate bad conscience. The stereotyped reply to questions is "Hungarian propaganda."

One might be tempted almost to believe that the expulsions were inspired by the Hungarian, not the Yugoslav Foreign Office, so seriously have they damaged the strong case against Hungary for harboring Croat terrorists that Yugoslavia has presented at Geneva.

Yugoslavia will have a hard task to convince the world it was necessary to expel invalids, old persons, women and children on a couple of hours' notice none at all, or that it could have endangered Yugoslavia to allow tearful mothers a few minutes to find their children before crossing the border.

Belgrade States Case by Radio

An official announcement was broadcast by radio from Belgrade on the whole situation. In Yugoslavia, it was stated, if all members of families were included, there were about 40,000 Hungarians. The vast majority, it was said, were not interfered with in any way, and no one was expelled except those who lacked identity papers, those without permits to work for wages and political suspects.

Among the latter, it was stated, were a number who had been in Yugoslavia for many years, and it was precisely because they were political suspect that they had been unable to obtain Yugoslav citizenship papers.

Hungary, on the other hand, was accused of having taken general action against 1,000 Yugoslavs in Hungary by expulsions and withdrawing from all their permits to earn a living.

"Reports published abroad alleging Yugoslav mobilization and concentration of troops on the frontier," it was asserted, " are pure invention without a vestige of foundation and must be energetically denied.

"No troops have been moved and not a man has been mobilized. On the contrary, frontier garrisons have been reduced to about half their normal strength through the departure of large numbers of men on Christmas leave.

"It is also untrue that Comitadji formations have moved to the frontier. The Comitadjis are a purely wartime formation and have no function to discharge in times of peace. Furthermore, the Yugoslav police and gendarmerie are fully capable of maintaining order in the frontier areas without any assistance.

"This old fairy tale of Comitadjis on the march is regularly served up whenever Hungarian propaganda campaigns start against Yugoslavia. To her neighboring States, Yugoslavia has nothing to hide."

Your correspondent can confirm entirely these denials of mobilization and troop concentration. Nothing of the sort has occurred. Except for the unfortunate victims of expulsion, the countryside remained perfectly calm.

Man Who Sank Emden In 1914 Dies, Aged 63

Vice-Adm. Glossop Was In Command Of Sydney During Engagement

Vice-Admiral J. C.-T. Glossop, C.B., who was in command of the Australian cruiser Sydney when she destroyed the Emden, the most successful of the German "commerce raiders" in 1914, died on Dec. 23 in a Weymouth nursing home, where he had been for a month. He was 63, and had been on the retired list since 1921.

News of his death will be received with regret in the Commonwealth, where his name is honored as the commanding officer in the outstanding achievement of the young Australian Navy, says an obituary in The Times, London.

His appointment to the Sydney was dated March 10, 1913, and he joined her while she was still under construction at Glasgow. She was commissioned some three months later at Portsmouth, and during the early days of the War took her part with the Australian Squadron in searching for German warships in the Pacific, destroying the enemy wireless stations, and escorting the Commonwealth troops.

She was actually engaged in the escort of an Australian convoy across the Indian Ocean, and was about 45 miles north of the Cocos Islands, on the morning of November 9, 1914, when the wireless station there reported an attack by the Emden, a landing party from which ship blew up the wireless mast and destroyed the installation. Captain M. L. Silver, R.N., senior officer of the convoy, in the Melbourne, detached Captain Glossop in the Sydney, and soon after 9 a.m. the two ships were in sight of each other.

Captain von Muller, in the Emden, hurriedly abandoned his shore party in order to get sea room, and was the first to open fire. His gunnery was "brilliant from the first," as the British Official History records, and at once straddled the Sydney, but the latter had the advantage in both speed and armament, and except for a control station disabled she sustained little damage.

After 40 minutes the Emden was holed all over and burning fiercely, but she continued the action and by 11.20 a.m. was sinking and trying to beach herself on the island. She ran aground with her flag still flying. No answer being received to Captain Glossop's repeated summonses to surrender, he was obliged to open fire again, when white flags were shown and a man was sent aloft to haul down the colors. Captain von Muller and other surviving officers and men (over 200) were rescued by the Sydney, which went to their assistance with doctors from the island.

Later the auxiliary cruiser Empress of Russia relieved the Sydney of all prisoners who could be moved, and the others were taken to Colombo. Captain Glossop was made C. B. for his services during the operations.

Son of Vicar

John Collings-Taswell Glossop was born on October 23, 1871, at Twickenham, where his father, the Rev. G. G. P. Glossop, was vicar. He passed into the Britannia as a naval cadet in January, 1885, and went to sea two years later in the Agincourt, flagship of Rear-Admiral C. J. Rowley, in the Channel Squadron.

In May, 1888, he began his first Australian service as midshipman of the Orlando, flagship of Rear-Admiral Lord Charles Scott, Commander-in-Chief on that station Subsequently he was lent to the Callioupe, Captain H. C. Kane, and in her experienced the terrible hurricane at Apia, Samoa, on March 16-17, 1889, which caused disaster unprecedented since the introduction of steam navigation. The Calliope alone survived shipwreck among the vessels there, which included the American flagship Trenton. For a time Glossop was also lent to the Egeria, surveying vessel, gaining more varied experience. He became sub-lieutenant in May, 1891, and served as such in the Royal Sovereign, flagship of Vice-Admiral Henry Fairfax in the Channel Squadron.

Receives Promotion

Promoted to lieutenant in June, 1893, he specialized in navigating duties. The ships which he navigated included the cruisers Scout, in the Mediterranean, and Royalist, in Australia. While in the latter he served throughout the Samoan troubles of 1899. In January, 1900, he was selected for instructional duties with the cadets in H.M.S. Britannia, at Dartmouth, and when ready to go to sea again he was given command of H.M.S. Lizard, gunboat, in Australia. In June, 1904, he was promoted to commander. For two years he was Drafting Commander at Chatham Barracks, and then had a further sea command in Australia—the light cruiser Prometheus (1908-10). Later he joined H.M.S. Hood, flagship at Queenstown, and in the promotion list at King George's Coronation he received advancement to captain.

When the Emden had been sunk, the Sydney to which, as stated above, Glossop had been appointed in 1913) was ordered to the West Indies, and subsequently was on patrol duties in both the North and South Atlantic. After the Jutland battle her services were needed in the North Sea, and she spent the winter of 1916-17 with the Grand Fleet.

Return To Australia.

Captain Glossop left her on April 2, 1917, after four years in command, and returned to Australia as Captain-in-Charge of the dockyard and naval establishment at Sydney, receiving later the rank of commodore. In addition to his British decoration he was made a member of the Japanese Order of the Rising Sun, Third Class, and an Office of the French Legion of Honour.

In 1918 he married Ethel Alison, daughter of Mr. John McPhiliamy, of Bathurst New South Wales. They had one son and one 4 daughter. Since his retirement Vice-Admiral Glossop had lived at Bridport, Dorset.

JUDGE SUZUKI ADDRESSES CLUB

Support of the Tokyo Women's club to the movement of abolishing the conditions and causes which lead to the delinquency of children was asked Monday by Judge Suzuki of the Juvenile court in an address before the club at the Y.W.C.A.

After tracing the origin of juvenile courts, Judge Suzuki discussed the causes of delinquency and gave examples from his personal work with children to show how conditions over which the children had no control and or which they were not to blame, led to their troubles. His talk was interpreted by Mrs. Shin Inouye.

He recalled that the firs juvenile court, formed in Chicago in 1899, was the direct outgrowth of activities in behalf of unfortunate children undertaken by women's clubs in Chicago. The first juvenile courts in Japan, he said ,were formed in 1923, one in Tokyo and one in Osaka. It wasn't until 1934 that a third juvenile court was created in Japan.

"While our age limit is 18," Judge Suzuki explained, "we cannot protect our children until they are 18 and then stop the day after their birthday. So usually we look after the children who have been brought to us until they are 23. The youngest with whom we have dealt have been 8 years old. We do not consider that we punish but that we prevent crimes of the future and that we protect children.

"There are nine preventative measures which can be taken with a child brought under our care and these begin with a slight admonishment and vary to hospitalization in the case of those physically unfit.

"When a new case arises, the probation officer investigates minutely the conditions with which the child is surrounded. He studies the character of the child, his manners, his education, his spiritual outlook, his physical well being, his family, environment, school, and his mental and moral inheritance. After this detailed investigation, he recommends which of the nine admonishing measures best fits the child.

"Then the child is called in to tell his side of the story. He is not brought before a judge who sits stern and grim-faced above him, in solemn, grave judicial robes in a strange court. Instead he is brought into an ordinary room that looks like the rooms he has been accustomed to all his life. There are pictures on the walls and flowers in the room. The judge does not frighten the child by wearing judicial robes.

"In this familiar, friendly atmosphere, the judge and the child sit down together and when the trial is concluded, one of the nine measures is enforced and a probation officer supervises the care of the child. The record of the 'trial' is secret. No visitors nor no policemen have listened as the child told his story. A few times, those who are interested in juvenile court work are allowed to be present but this is very rare. For publishing any accounts of children in juvenile court, there is a punishment of not less than one year imprisonment or fine of not less than 1,000 yen," Judge Suzuki said.

Petty thievery, he declared, was the major offense for which children were brought into court. Murder and arson are comparatively minor in number.

In tracing the growth of delinquency, he said that a child of wealthy parents is the continual target of a gang of boys who steal or a gang that can be found in any community and in any school. He is induced to join the gangs because the other boys think he has money. Some children are deliquent because their parents are drunkards who do no give them the right care. Others come into courts because of inheritance, such as insanity. Of late, Judge Suzuki continued, sleeping sickness has been a cause.

Judge Suzuki amused his audience with the story of a boy who became delinquent after sleeping sickness. Although the story itself aroused the sympathy of the women, the incidents were not without humor. After his illness, this boy would suddenly become violent, but his violence had powers to charm, particularly, to charm animals. At one time, he freed all the animals in Hibiya park. At another time, he freed snakes in a street car. Once when he was chasing an ostrich which had become freed from his cage on a roof, the boy was so intent on his chase that he jumped after the ostrich when it flew from the roof to a near by roof. But the roof on which the boy jumped was of glass so he fell through and down into a women's public bath below, causing the women to run helter skelter.

"While more children of the poorer classes are brought to court, poverty alone is not the only cause of delinquency and we have had many children from wealthy families," Judge Suzuki continued.

He spoke in detail about a boy from a wealthy family, who stole electric machines. When found by police, he had a room full of such machines which he had stolen during week-ends. The probation officer discovered that the boy's parents went to the country during the week-ends, leaving him in care of the servants who were not fitted to for dealing with the problems of rearing a child. Judge Suzuki pointed to the moral of the story—that even wealthy parents must take a personal interest in their children.

Dance halls and night clubs must be wiped out for they provide the temptations which lead children to commit offenses, Judge Suzuki stressed.

In addition to family life and environment, the school is also a cause of children's delinquency, he declared and told the story of how a teacher caused a boy to become a thief.

This boy, he said, was always late for school. Once he was made to stand before his class for an hour as an object of shame. The lad never forgot this humiliation—he stopped school and started to steal from neighborhood shops. When the probation officer investigated, he learned that the boy's father was dead and the mother ill. The boy had arisen early every morning to sell a kind of pickled bean on the street for this pickled bean was a breakfast delicacy. With the money he thus earned over and above the cost of the product, the boy bought rice, hurried home, and cooked it for his mother and himself. It was this that had made him late for school each morning.

"If the teacher had taken him aside and asked him in a friendly manner why he was late for school, the boy might have told but instead, she asked him before all his classmates and the boy was naturally reluctant to tell how poor he was," Judge Suzuki said.

He declared that vanity was the biggest cause of delinquency among girls. Girls would go out with boys because they thought the boys came from wealthy families but of course they turned out to be as poor as the girls, if not even more poverty stricken.

In conclusion, the Judge asked the co-operation of the Women's club in removing temptation from children and he sought support of the club in the movement to eradicate the conditions which lead to delinquency among youth.

Plot To Kidnap President Told At Red Inquiry

Communists Plan General Strike, Then Civil War, C.C.C. Captain Testifies

A reputed Communist plot to kidnap President Roosevelt and an alleged Fascist scheme to set up a dictatorship were made public recently by the House Committee investigating un-American activities according to the New York Herald Tribune.

Walter S. Steele, of Washington, appearing for the American coalition of patriotic, civil and fraternal societies, said a Red plan was being widely circulated in Communist circles to create civil war during a general strike, invade the White House, kidnap the President, his Cabinet, too, take over the government and supersede it with a Soviet state.

An Army captain, Samuel Glazier, of Baltimore, in charge of a Civilian Conservation Camp at Eldridge, Md., told the committee about the dictatorship plan.

Glazier said Jackson Martindell, New York attorney, had discussed with him formation of the "American Vigilantes," 500,000 strong and backed with $700,000,000, to turn out the Administration and set up Martindell as dictator. Glazier testified in New York recently. His testimony was made public before Steele appeared before the committee.

Martindell, Glazier said, told him "he knew with the present policies of the President, eventually the country was coming to a revolution, and when that time came he wanted to be ready with his organization to take over the government...

"He said there ought to be one man who would run the country, and he would be the head of the organization."

A police raid on a Communist strike school during the Minneapolis truck strike last August, Steel said, yielded the first documents disclosing the plans.

The hearing concluded the committee's protracted inquiry that took it through a maze of testimony on Communism, Nazism and Fascism in the United States.

Chairman John D. McCormack, Democrat, Massachusetts, said the committee might seek an extension of time to write its report to the House.

Christmas Questioned About Fund

Earlier the committee questioned Albert G. Christmas, New York attorney, about approximately $154,000 said have by other committee witnesses to have been made available by Robert Sterling Clark, New York capitalist, to combat inflation and to promote sound money sentiment.

Christmas said about $33,000 went to the committee on sound money and sound currency, headed by Gerald C. MacGuire, New York bond and stock salesman, and the rest to MacGuire.

The witness said MacGuire never gave an accounting of how the money was spent and none was asked. He said MacGuire had ¥64,000 in cash at the time of the American Legion convention in Chicago in 1933. The convention adopted a resolution, backed by MacGuire, which approved resumption of the gold standard.

Army of 500,000 Sought

General Smedley D. Butler's story of an offer to lead a Nazi march on Washington was overshadowed on December 29 by that of a young Army captain who informed the House Nazi investigating committee of plans for a storm troop dictatorship army of 500,000 young Gentiles.

Samuel Glazier, commander of a C.C.C. camp at Elkridge, Md., described in graphic detail a visit to the fifty-acre estate of Jackson Martindell, of New York, and testified Martindell said that $700,000,000 would be at disposal of the organization he planned to lead when President Roosevelt's policies send "the country to the dogs."

He visited Martindell at his Bernardsville, N. J., estate and said that after hearing "rather derogatory remarks in general about Jews," he was shown about the estate. He testified that Martindell thought "that the country, at not any too distant future, was going to the dogs and that he wanted an organization to take over the country when that time came."

Tells of $700,000,000 Fund

"He wanted an organization of 500,000 young men," Glazier said. "He said there was $700,000,000 that he controlled—not that he had it personally but that he controlled through his office, estates and things of that sort."

Glazier asserted that Martindell proposed to take all women and all Jews out of industrial jobs and give the jobs to young men. He said he was told by Martindell that the latter had "talked to Hitler personally." An arm-band which carried, instead of a swastika, a red eagle on a blue background was shown him. A "V" superimposed on the emblem was supposed to stand for the American Vigilantes.

"He had a flag that they were in the process of making and he also showed me a membership card which a man was to sign to belong to this particular organization. On the back of this membership card it said, roughly, 'I swear to uphold the Constitution of the United States and the President'—things of that sort—'and to get rid of all undesirables and criminals.'

"Nothing was said about who the undesirables were. But he (Martindell) went on further to explain that the word 'undesirable' in that sense meant Jews. I was dumbfounded."

Martindell Evades Reporters

Jackson Martindell was not at home to newspaper men who tried to reach him yesterday afternoon at his estates at Bernardsville, N. J. He has been actively engaged in editorial statistical and public relations work of a financial nature since 1921. He has contributed financial articles to many newspapers and magazines and for more than nine years was engaged as chief statistician with Bledget & Co. When the latter concern became known as Stone & Webster & Blodget. Inc., in 1927 he took on the added duties of managing sales promotion, advertising and public relations.

In 1930 he became associated with C. Shelby Carter and the two formed a partnership known as Carter, Martindell & Co., which had offices at 115 Broadway. A year later Mr. Martindell was elected president of the Wall Street Securities Company, an investment trust.

Goemboes Eager For Friendship With Yugoslavia

Hungarian Premier's Stand Is Good Augury For Future Relations

Whatever coures future relations between Hungary and Yugoslavia may take will depend largely on the goodwill—or lack fo it—manifested by their respective governments, says Mr. Frederick T. Birchall in a despatch to The New York Times. His article follows:

From the head of one of those governments, this correspondent obtained today an unqualified expression of good-will and peaceful intentions toward all his country's neighbors, which, coming at this time, is a good augury for the future.

So desirous is Marshal Julius Goemboes (he received his new title a few weeks ago in commemoration of Admiral Nicholas Horthy's fifteen years of peaceful administration) that no ill-considered word shall mar the prospect of an equitable adjustment of the new problems which have arisen for his country that he will not discuss them except in general terms and on the broadest basis.

This correspondent had asked the Hungarian Premier an outline of questions covering the Geneva decision, refugees from Yugoslavia and what is to be done with them, the matter of Hungary's present boundaries, which constantly raise new difficulties, and the chances of their equitable revision. The Marshal was smilingly cordial but earnestly firm in his refusal to talk in detail on any of these things.

"I do not want to discuss the merits of the Geneva decision," he said. "Hungary has agreed to it. She will keep her word and carry out loyally all to which she has pledged herself. I am resolved no word of mine shall compromise that prospect of peaceful adjustment.

Wishes All to Have Peace

"We wish for peace not only at home but in all the countries around us. It is not good for Hungary that there should be troubles in any country, particularly a neighboring country. They bring repercussions which affect us. Especially is this the case as far as Central and Southeastern Europe are concerned.

"My hope is for a prolonged period of tranquillity in this part of the world, during which we can all attend to our national affairs and promote the interests of our peoples.

"I wish for peace personally for a very good reason—because I am a soldier and know what war means. There could be no stronger incentive to the promotion of good relations than actual experience of war.

"With hard work, a wise commercial policy and political peace—that is the preliminary condition to all economic progress—I hope, I believe that Hungary's situation will improve. I am glad to be able to tell you that there are already signs this is coming to pass. Statistics for last month show a certain improvement. I have just seen them.

"Our exports are better. Taxes are being paid in larger measure. There is a new building activity distributed pretty well throughout the country. We are even using more motor cars, not of course the large number or proportion that would impress your people in the United States, but many more for Hungary. We are a small country and without your great resources.

"I do not want, therefore, to overemphasize or even dwell on what I hope will prove merely ephemeral difficulties. There are broader aspects of our situation which are more hopeful. The Hungarian people have come to realize that self-sacrifice and solidarity are the needs of the present hour and the only means through which lasting improvement will be achieved. We are a loyal, self-reliant, determined people and by peaceful means we will work out our own salvation."

Question Waved Aside

The Premier spoke earnestly, especially when he referred to his soldiering experiences, which had made him for his people's sake more devoted to peace.

He waved aside detailed questions as to the refugees, the amount of confidence he placed in recent intimations that Yugoslavia's deportations are ended, the not impossible contingency that unforeseen occurrences might provoke a repetition in other quarters which existing treaties would be powerless to check.

"It is not helpful to talk about other countries," he said.

It is known, however, that intermediaries are at work to bring about amicable adjustment of the refugee problem. Many of the deported left behind their possessions which are of more importance in their lives than any abstract question of nationality or flag. Many, in fact, have been persistent applicants for Yugoslav citizenship.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Oldest Old Maid

Mlle. Marguerite Chemin, daughter of Leonard and Claudine Chemin of Belmont, France who has been referred to as the oldest "old maid" in the world, was born on January 9, 1784, and died in 1914 at the venerable age of 130 years. It has long been believed and printed that there were no centenarians outside of marriage, Miss Chemin who prided herself greatly upon being an excepton to that rule, bore her distinction for many long years with dignity and cheerfulness.

intentions and would pave the way for an arms agreement. Until now the Reich has stubbornly refused to enter a general agreement of this kind, but Laval hopes that a peaceful settlement of the Saar's status, if it can be achieved, may change Berlin's attitude.

Perhaps another obstacle to the conclusion of the Eastern Locarno pact has been the repeated rumors that France and Russia have secretly signed a military alliance. Such reports have been strongly denied here by the Government, and the best-informed French observers insist that to discuss such a Franco-Russian military alliance is at least premature. This opinion appears to be much strengthened by the protocol signed in Geneva between Maxim Litvinoff, Russian Foreign Commissar, and the French Foreign Minister on December 5, which M. Laval read to the Senate.

The protocol declares that France and the Soviets agree to enter no negotiations for a bilateral accord so long as there is any possibility of an Eastern Locarno being realized. "Le Temps" remarks regarding this fact, "It is only in case the two governments recognize the futility of pursuing negotiations for an Eastern pact that they will consult on new assurances which would appear to them opportune to give themselves."

This seems a very broad hint to Berlin that the French and the Soviets are postponing consideration of any closer bilateral agreement in the definite hope that Germany will change her policy and enter the Eastern Locarno as a new rampart against war. The frankness of this warning, at least as "Le Temps" voices it, and that newspaper usually is well informed on governmental opinion, seems unmistakably clear.

It would indicate that Berlin soon may have to choose between association with an Eastern pact to prevent aggression, and running the unpleasant risk of additional Franco-Russian ties being established, which might place the Soviets indisputedly on the French side in event of hostilities.

Social and Personal Notes

Mrs. H. A. MACRAE

Tokyo society will see, at the Variety Show to be given by the Japan Humane Society at 7:30 p.m. Friday at the Little Theater of Takarazuka, a Highland Fling danced by a woman who has been a leader in the movement to revive the old country dances of Scotland.

Mrs. H. A. Macrae of the British Embassy who is pictured above in the Gordon tartan which she will wear Friday evening, knows the country dances of Scotland as few do.

She is a charter member of the Scots Country Dance Society, an organization that was formed about seven years ago to keep the traditional country dances of Scotland alive. At that time it was evident that the Highland Fling and other dances for which Scotland is noted, were disappearing. Today, the Scots Country Dance Society has more than 5,000 members, each of whom are active in the many branches of the organization which form a network throughout the country.

Mrs. Macrae, who loves the country dances from the artistic as well as the social standpoint, has done a tremendous amount of work to re-establish the dances among the country people. In the summers before she came to Japan, she taught classes of young girls such dances as "Lady MacDonald's Reel" and "Flowers of Edinburg." She did this as a hobby and she said the work gave her as much pleasure as anything she had ever done. The dances were enjoyed in beautiful outdoor settings and the girls with whom she worked were enthusiastic and talented.

Mrs. Macrae is also an authority on the "sets" or plaid squares which make up the kilts. Each family has its own set which is registered and which is highly prized, she said. The kilt which she will wear Friday evening has a blue and black background upon which green and yellow and threads of other blue have been superimposed.

The dance which she will give at the Humane Society's Variety Show was originally danced by men but as it is probably the most popularly and widely known of the Scotch dances and the one in which a general public is most interested, Mrs. Macrae has selected it for the program.

"LAST CITY IS DESCRIBED

"Excavations at Mizpeh" was the subject of an illustrated lecture given by Dr. Wm. Fredrick Bade of the Pacific School of Religion at the Kyoto Neesima Kaikan, Saturday evening. He gave a similar lecture to the students of Doshisha Theological Seminary, Monday morning at the school.

He explained that his archeological work has been for the purpose of throwing light on the Bible and its history. His latest expedition was made to locate a city lost for nearly two thousand years. In order to make clear how a city could be lost from view for such a period of time he pointed out that there were two classes of people who occupied Palestine ,Syria and Egypt prior to and contemporaneous with the Israielites occupation of the former. These were first, the Nomads who were herders of sheep, wandering about the desert, and second, the farmers, who tilled the soil.

"These two classes have always been and still are enemies. The farmers built cities to protect themselves against the raids of the Nomads. Usually these were constructed on an elevated place with a surrounding wall about the rim for insulation. Inside this enclosure they lived at night. During the day they tilled the soil," he said.

That the place for which he was seeking was an actuality was attested by many Biblical passages. The Book of Kings located the place somewhere north of Jerusalem. "Judges" identifies the city in such a way that it must have been lost for nearly twenty centuries. The inhabitants usually referred to a certain hill by the name "Prophet Samuel" as being the long lost site of the lost city. But Dr. Bade was certain the natives were mistaken. And to prove their error, he organized an expedition in 1925 which is still continuing its work, for the purpose of determining and excavating the true site. In February of the following year, while walking along the hill tops north of Jerusalem, looking for broken bits of pottery, he found some suggestive fragments just thirteen kilometers from the capital city. Believing that this particular place might be the one in question, he secured airplane photographs of the locality made during the war, and located the hill. The photograph taken at a great height revealed the contours of a buried structure. Ordering an enlarged copy of the photograph from Germany, the evidence strengthened his conviction that underneath the surface of that hill was a buried city. After securing the permission of the British government to excavate, they began on the day before daster to dig, and within thirty minutes had reached a buried wall which was over six meters thick, made of limestone with clay for mortar. While this was only a protecting corner, it was nevertheless the largest city wall ever found in the near East. They believed that it must have been of Cannanite origin, but later discoveries of Hebrew pottery buried underneath proved its unmistakable Hebrew origin. It was the wall mentioned in the Fifteenth chapter of first Kings which tells of King Asia fortifying Mispeh by using the enforced labor of all Israelites.

By the use of colored slides, Dr. Bade carried the audience to the site of the excavations, showed the progress of his party step by step, and then explained how the city was finally overcome by invading Assyrians, and demolished. He concluded with the presentation of some pictures of Palestinian flowers.

The Stomach of Diamond Jim

"Diamond Jim" Brady, picturesque character of the New York of the "Naughty Nineties," was as much noted for his gargantuan appetite as for his dazzling collection of diamonds. He regularly ate a fourteen-course dinner consisting of three or four helpings of everything on the menu, and finished off with a three-pound box of chocolates. Strangely enough, Brady never drank liquor or wine.

In 1912—five years before his death—"Diamond Jim" was taken to Johns Hopkins Hospital for treatment. Under the fluoroscope much to the amazement of the specialists, it was discovered that Brady's stomach was six times the normal size.

Fusel Oil

Contrary to a very general view,—a fallacy built up during prohibition—old whiskey contains more fusel oil than new whiskey. Fusel oil is developed as whiskey ages and consists of a mixture of higher alcohols, mainly butyl and amyl. These higher alcohols impart to aged whiskey its characteristic taste and aroma. Also contrary to popular belief fusel oil is non-poisonous.

Work Of Wrights Paved Way For Conquest Of Air

Tremendous Progress Made Since First Flight Was Made 31 Years Ago

Editor's note: The world's first controlled flight in a power-driven aeroplane was made by Orville Wright in the United States on Dec. 17, 1904. He was in the air 58 seconds and flew a distance of 850 feet with his 12 H.P. Wright biplane.

As the thirty-first anniversary of the first powered flight by the Wright Brothers is celebrated all over the United States on Dec. 17, 1934, aviation is found to be making great strides in efficiency and refinement and has turned eyes definitely toward those last stretches over thee oceans and the stratosphere blanket 10 miles above the earth. The blue reaches of the Atlantic and Pacific and the vast dome of the sky apparently are soon to yield their secrets.

"Sorry to be so early," is Sir Charles Kingsford-Smith's amusing and graceful excuse for efficiency as early in November he lands at Oakland, Calif., two hours earlier than he had intended, inward bound from Honolulu, last leg in a transpacific flight from Brisbane, Australia. Plane and motor design had joined hands practically to halve his 1928 record, and the first flight across the Pacific, and set the new time of 54 hours and 29 minutes, actual flying time.

Racing planes are compelled, too, to look to their laurels as the distinction between them and commercial design rapidly diminishes. C. W. A. Scott and Campbell Black, British fliers, in a specially built racing plane, make the amazing time of 71 hours competing against a crack field of international pilots in the MacRobertson London-to-Melbourne speed and handicap race held last October.

Amazing Time Made

Yet Parmentier and Moll, Dutch fliers, in an American commercial transport plane, make the amazing time of 90 hours, only 20 hours difference, in the same race carrying passengers and mail and taking every airport on the long 10,000-mile route in their stride. And not far behind them are Roscoe Turner and Clyde Pangborn in another transport plane practically duplicating the Dutch fliers' record in a time of 93 odd hours.

Maj. "Eddie" Rickenbacker dramatically calls attention to the same plane used by the Dutch fliers when he made a new time of 12 hours and 4 minutes in a transcontinental flight from Los Angeles to New York in November. That is again very close to the record of 10 hours and 5 minutes made and held by Turner in 1933 in a special racing plane in the Bendix race.

Size, too, apparently makes little difference so long as there is good design. Pan American Airways' new 38-passenger flying boat flies 1800 miles on a test flight at a speed of 157 miles an hour, and in August places New York within six days of Buenos Aires, as it does the long trek from the Argentine capital to Miami in five days.

Stability of design enables aeroproblems of relieving pilots of many nautical designers to go into the weary hours of instrument flying. A noted manufacturer of navigational equipment attacks the problem and in 1933 an American transcontinental air line installs robot pilots in its planes allowing pilots to set their course and fly "hands off" the controls.

Motors improve, allowing planes to operate at higher altitudes and use the increased height to coast "downhill" to their terminals, reaching intermediate stops minutes earlier, terminal sops hours earlier. Multi-pitch propellers are introduced so that blades get a better "grip" at these high altitudes and consequently save fuel and operating costs, since motors are not compelled to be throttled higher.

In Sealed Cabins

Wiley Post, sealed in a suit resembling that of a diver, tries for a stratosphere record, but falls short. He "breathes" by means of a blower operated from his engine and pumping air into his suit. By letting the air escape slowly he is thus able to keep the air inside his suit at normal atmospheric pressure.

Designers for stratosphere flight consider sealing plane cabins in the same fashion as Post's suit seals him, forcing air in them by engine-operated or battery-operated blowers and then letting it escape slowly as Post does. Post's "Pangee" ingenuity seems to offer one solution at least to upper air flight.

Passeger comfort brings aviation away from the days of shouting at the traveler across the aisle in order to be heard above the roar of engines and wing tips. Two American transcontinental airline operators make definite dents in the noise problems by "sound proofing" their planes so that passengers are able to converse in normal tones from seat to seat. Finally all major carriers fall in line by either doing their own sound-deadening or purchasing new "silent-cabin" planes.

Imperial Airways in Great Britain astonishes even the railroads by announcing that its dining services on its cross-channel air services have returned a profit to the company. Its large 38-passenger "Silver Wing" expresses carry a chef and two stewards, working from a compact little pantry. It adds weight, Imperial says, but bookings go up as passengers are attracted by dining in comfort as the English Channel glides beneath them.

Sleeper Service Offered

An American company makes an overnight haul more enjoyable by inaugurating sleeper services between Chicago and New York, Fort Worth and Los Angeles. So successful is its sleeper services that the line orders additional sleeper planes. A Dutch company also installs berths to cut the time down on its Amsterdam-Batavia, Java runs.

As the year ends, transoceanic flight by heavier-than-air craft becomes imminent. Inspired by American aviation success in South America, France and Germany inaugurate mail flights across the South Atlantic between Africa and South America.

Passenger flights are in the offing as France rushes completion of a giant new plane twice the size of the craft now being built by Pan American Airways for transpacific flight. The French craft will have private staterooms with their own baths.

Thus France appears to be getting a jump on the whole world since large craft are necessarily slow to build.

At Baltimore and Bridgeport America's answers to transpacific flight are being thoroughly conditioned. These giant flying boats will probably be receiving their shake-down tests in the Caribbean as the new year begins. Later tests will come in the Pacific. Visualized is a 56-hour service, actual flying time, between the west coast of the United States and China by way of the Islands.

At Nanking a German air company plans a service from that city to Berlin by way of Moscow. Imperial Airways announces a service from New York to Bermuda in co-operation with an American company. The Dutch government-owned company plans a service from Amsterdam to its West Indies colonies. As the holiday bells ring out, mail started on its way by the Duke of Kent should have reached Australia in the inauguration of a London-to-Australia mail service.

'New Deal' Is 4,000 Yrs. Old; Kown In Egypt

science and the rise of a sense of social responsibility after 300 B. C., which began the great transformation, were events of yesterday.

Those events marked our father man's approach to the frontiers of a new country. Today we his children have hardly crossed those frontiers to begin the exploration of the new country beyond. We stand in hesitation upon its outer margins; the beauty and sublimity of its distant prospects are hidden from us by the mists of human frailty, or blackened by the stifling smoke of greed, selfishness and world war.

Blinded and dismayed we have stumbled and faltered with the foothills of the new country all before us, while beyond them, if we would but lift our eyes, are glorious glimpses of the delectable mountains. Toward their still unscaled heights points the long and rising trail behind us, revealing to us, as it has risen from savagery to character, an unconquerable buoyancy of the human soul that has somehow issued from the depths and risen so high.

In using the words "unconquerable buoyancy of the human soul." I am not employing a meaningless rhetorical phrase. I first used those words years ago in a university convocation address, after returning from a journey among the buried cities of the ancient Orient, where I had felt as never before the meaning of the great fact that in the life which once pulsed in the streets of those now long vanished cities, man had for the first time risen from the conquest of material resources to visions of social idealism so vital that they have continued to be a power among us who are building Western civilization in the light of the great truths which still shine out of the East.

We have only to look around us in this still unconquered depression to realize that the historical buoyancy of the human soul is still with us. It constantly speaks from the White House itself, and whether we approve it or not, we are in the midst of an impressive manifestation of it in the New Deal. I have not been able to read all the books of its leading protagonists, but I have been impressed with the sincerity which pervades some of their writing.

New Deal Found Not New

This has been especially noticeable in the recent books of the Secretary of Agriculture. The sprit in which he sets forth his views must evoke the sympathy of all; but if the social idealism expressed in the New Deal is to succeed, as the great majority of the American people hope it will, I believe that its supporters must realize more fully that the New Deal is not new, and that it is endeavoring again to make practically effective a type of social idealism that is over 4,000 years old.

The high noon of that ethical day, which history now shows is dawning in the life of man, is still very far away. We may hope that the right kind of education will accelerate the advance, but the effort to perpetuate idealistic sentiments by legislation or by government action has been shown by history to be utterly futile.

Message of History Priceless

It is at this point that the message of history is priceless. Our hope for the future lies in the unquestioned historical fact which I have called "the Great Transformation"—the most important event in the history of the universe in so far as it is known to us. That was a change indeed, which transformed savage or barbarous human life and brought social idealism into the world—something which it had never known before. That change has, in varying measure, been successfully transmitted from generation to generation for more than 5,000 years. That fundamentally important fact is a tangible reason for believing that it will go on, for the change was in itself much more difficult than its subsequent transmission.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Pilgrims Were Not Puritans

The Puritans were those dissenters from the Established Church of England, who held that the English Protestant Church was not Protestant enough. The Pilgrims were Separatists who held that a Church Established in Law was wrong. They advocated independent self-governed local congregations. The Pilgrims fled to Leyden, Holland from Puritan persecution. When they emigrated to the New World, they were already separated from the Church of England. The Puritans came here as members of the Church of England with no thought of separation. The distinction between the Pilgrims who settled in Plymouth and the Puritans who settled in Boston is very important. The Pilgrims were an independent colony until 1691 when they merged with the Puritans. Strangely enough it was the Pilgrims' not the Puritans' conception of Church Government which was finally to prevail in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

U.S. and Canada Weigh Project To Save Niagara

Agreement Likely Soon On Diversion To Reduce Erosion Of Falls

The echoes of recent rock crashes at Niagara Falls were heard plainly both in Washington and Ottawa, and early efforts to ratify the treaty approving plans for preserving the great cataract's beauty are indicated, says D. M. Halliday in a recent dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune from Toronto.

The article dated Dec. 29, continues:

President Roosevelt has called for a report on the status of the treaty killed by the United States Senate in 1931, and Governor Herbert H. Lehman of New York has promised his support of a campaign recently launched in Buffalo to save the falls from erosion.

After centuries of movement up the river, during which the crest has backed up seven miles, the falls have finally emerged from the narrow gorge and are constantly broadening, providing a wider front over which the water spreads. This has had to effect in the case of the Canadian, or Horseshoe, Falls, of concentrating the erosion in the middle, leaving the flanks bare. The proposed remedy would spread the flow evenly across the brink, and thus distribute the wearing effect of the water.

Steady Backward Movement

In 1764, the brink of the Horseshoe Falls curved across from the tip of Goat Island to the Canadian shore. It moved back 470 feet in the next seventy-eight years, the curve becoming narrower. By 1875 the brink was 130 feet farther upstream, and it was cut back 220 more feet by 1927.

Investigations by a special international board reported in a voluminous tome in 1928 as a basis for a convention between Canada and the United States which was ratified by the Canadian government of Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King, refuted the widely circulated statement that the Horseshoe Falls was "committing suicide." Careful surveys and estimates of engineers showed that the Horseshoe was in no immediate danger of degenerating into a cascade and eventually draining the American Falls.

Two Channels Converge

There are two deep and swift channels in the rapids just above the Horseshoe Falls separated by an area of extremely shallow water. These two currents have converged near the center of the river, causing especially rapid erosion in the center of the cataract Erosion at the flanks, particularly at the Goat Island shelf at the United States end of the fall, virtually has ceased because of draining of the water from the shelf by the upstream movement of the Horseshoe and diversion of water for power. A secondary result of the flank draining was to allowed large rocks to pile up at the base and prevent undercutting. The central part of the Horseshoe has been receding 3.7 feet a year since 1842 and 2.3 feet since 1906.

Receding Up Deep Channel

Engineers say that the direction of maximum recession for years has been up the deep channel on the Canadian side and not in the so-called "Notch," where in recent years the recession has been almost negligible.

It is estimated that the recession will not progress to the point of draining the American Falls for at least 2,000 years. Its movement upstream is negligible because the flow over the main fall as it receded along and past the face of the American Falls was not sufficient to cut through the hard layer of rock at the foot, thus leaving a resting place for huge masses of rock which fell from the cliff. As here has never been sufficient flow over the American Falls to wear this stone pile away, undercutting has been prevented. Under the treaty the low-water flow through the American channel would be increased by from 2,500 to 3,000 cubic feet a second, making the water leap clear over the brink instead of merely falling over the edge of the cliff as it does now and detracting from the scenic effect.

The type of construction thought best suited to rewater the flanks of the Horseshoe properly is a combination of excavations and submerged weirs carried from the shores into the main currents only far enough to accomplish the desired reflection of water to the bared flanks. The special international board's plan is susceptible of progressive extension upstream and into the rapids to the extent required to effect any reasonable additional diversions which may be agreed on.

$1,750,000 Estimated Cost

Basic estimates of the cost, $1,750,000, include $450,000 at the United States flank of the Horseshoe Falls, $300,000 at the Canadian flank of the Horseshoe Falls, and $1,000,000 above the American Falls.

Under the treaty, construction will not cost either the United States or Canada anything but the expense of the surveys. In 1928, the special international board received a joint letter from the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the Niagara Falls Power Company of New York, offering to construct at their own expense the remedial works recommended in the report, on condition that the commission and company be permitted to divert and use for power purposes additional quantities of water during the non-tourist season from October 1 to March 31.

King George Urges Unity On Empire

London song.

It was interesting to note how the musical pitch of the melody sung in London differed from the general pitch at Melbourne, how Melbourne differed from Canada, and so on, and how accurately radio brought the American auditor back to London again, exactly on the tonal pitch of the English singers.

Among those who spoke were a dairy farmer in New Zealand, lumberjacks at a French Canadian camp near Quebec a New Zealand announcer, a gardener in the Melbourne botanical gardens, a British officer in India, a patient in the Royal Hospital at Chelsea, a tea planter in Southern India, a group of Irishmen in the Irish Free State and similar groups in Scotland and Wales.

Others were a grandmother in Cape Province, South Africa; the acting Governor of Southern Rhodesia, a Canadian fisherman, a whaler off New Zealand, the toll collector of the Mersey Tunnel at Liverpool, the Benedictine Choir, singing in the catacombs of Rome; the toll-keeper of the Sydney Bridge, Australia; children at a Winnipeg skating party, a Toronto hockey-game announcer, a Tasmanian fisherman, a South African miner and an English shepherd who had never seen the ocean or London.

The King's Address

King George's address follows:

On this Christmas Day I send to all my people everywhere my Christmas greetings, the day with its hallowed memories in the festivity of the family. I would like to think with you who are listening to me now, in whatver part of the world you may be, that all the peoples of this Empire are bound to me and to one another by the spirit of one great family.

The Queen and I were deeply moved by the manner in which this spirit was manifested a month ago at the marriage of our dear son and daughter. My desire and hope is that the same spirit may become stronger in its hold and wider in its range.

The world is still restless and troubled. The clouds are lifting, but we have still our own anxieties to meet. I am convinced that if we meet them in the spirit of one family we shall overcome them, for then private and party interests will be controlled by care for the whole community.

It is as members of one family that we shall today and always remember those other members of it who are suffering from sickness or from the lack of work, or both, and we shall endeavor to do our utmost to befriend them.

I send a special greeting to the peoples from my dominions overseas. Through them the family has become a fellowship of free nations and they have carried into their own homes the memories and traditions of the mother country. The burdens of the world know no barriers of space.

If my voice reaches any of the people of India, let it bring assurance of my constant care for them and of my desire that they, too, may evermore fully realize and value their own place in the unity of the one family.

May I add very simply and sincerely that if I may be regarded as in some true sense the head of this great and widespread family, sharing its life and sustained by its affection, this will be a full reward for the long and sometimes anxious labors of my reign of well nigh five and twenty years.

As I sit in my own home, I am thinking of the great multitude who are listening to my voice, whether they be in British homes or in far-off regions of the world. For you all, and especially for your children, I wish a happy Christmas. I commend you to the Father of Whom every family in Heaven and on earth is named. God bless you all!

The "Swell" Gobbler

The turkey gobbler is like the peacock. His real size is greatly exaggerated as he struts around the barnyard. The peacock is all fine feathers and practically nobody, but the turkey gobbler has the added advantage of having a large air sac just beneath the skin on his breast. As he "shows off," this air sac is puffed out, and all his feathers are fluffed out, making him look more than twice his real size.

High Flying at 76

At the airport of Bekesbourne, Kent, England, R. C. Ramsay, who is now over 76 years old, continues to be an active air enthusiast, bumping about in the clouds.

Ramsay took out his pilot's license at the age of 70, and his entire family are licensed pilots. One son was killed recently in a plane crash but the Old Man remained undaunted, saying: "The air is safer than most other forms of travels and my son's death was due to his inexperience."

Social and Personal Notes

DANCERS OUTSTANDING ON VARIETY PROGRAM

Korean dances by Miss Sai Shoki and a Highland Fling by Mrs. H. A. Macrae of the British Embassy were outstanding acts in the entertainment known as the Variety Show which the Japan Humane Society gave Friday evening at the Little Theater of Takarazuka.

In her first dance, an "Elegy," Miss Shoki wore a transparant black tulle costume under which was a brief red tunic. From her head was draped, in nun fashion, a long black veil and she danced against a black curtain. From her neck swung a large silver cross which caught and reflected the light as the spotlight followed her about on the darkened stage. It was a dance of art and poetry, of exquisite motion and the pictures which Miss Shocki cut are pictures to be long remembered.

Her second dance was a sword dance....a warrior's strenuous ballet....a dance of thunder and of drama. Miss Shoki wore a gold and silver suit, a high silver crown, and shoes that had long, upward curving toes. She clashed, stamped, and swung about the stage to the beat of a drum.

Miss Shoki closed her program with a popular dance of Korea which is used to express the gayety of the populace at festival time. For this she wore a white costume, the trousers of which were satin.

Mrs. Macrae, light, easy and swift on the stage, brought the freshness, the mirth and animation of the countryside to the stage in her dancing of the Highland Fling which was thoroughly enjoyed by everyone. She was enchored twice and the large audience was reluctant to let her pert figure depart.

The program opened with acrobatic stunts by Maruichi Kotetsu and his company. With almost delightful skill, the men tossed teapots and bottles around, caught and juggled them on sticks and in a general way diverted the audience.

Song dances of the Shumsei-Kai children followed and the little girls made charming figures in their colorful kimonos. In their pantomine, they suggested falling cherry leaves, moon-viewing, and carrying of trees. Small though some of them were, they used the long sleeves of their kimonos in effective ways to emphasize the dance. The children are the pupils of Mrs. Shibusawa. The songs they interpreted were sung by Miss Kikuchi.

Mrs. Julliot de la Morandiere who was accompanied by Mr. Paul Rosenstand, sang a collection of French songs. Mrs. de la Morandiere, who has sung for charities in Paris but who usually does not sing publicly, revealed a charming and sweet voice.

There were many intermissions during the program and booths and coffee pots in the lounge were as crowded as the theater itself, where many persons had to stand in the aisles. The seats were taken long before the program began.

In the second part of the program, Madame Foujita sang a collection of French songs which she interpreted in a carefree manner that was quite diverting. She was accompanied by the Tokyo Polyphonic Orchestra which played a ballet suite. At the close of this number, Mme. Foujita changed her "sort of" peasants dress for a grass skirted costume, and came back to give a take-off on the hula-hula which again indicated that given a stage Mme. Foujita always knows what to do.

A 50-piece samisen orchestra played music which has always been a favorite with the people, particularly in January as its happy melodies are retarded as a symbol of the felicity of the New Year. The playing of this music on the Variety Program was a happy thought in consideration of the international group which composed the audience.

Congratulations on the program go to Mr. K. Kurosawa who was the producer.

The other film was a light musical "Let's Fall in Love" starring Edmund Lowe and Ann Sothern.

Interest Focused On Siam's Capital

Unrest In Bangkok, 'Venice Of The Orient,' Might Lead To King's Abdication

The possibility that King Prajadhipok of Siam, now in England, will abdicate his throne owing to unrest in Bangkok, the Siamese capital, casts international interest on that city of Southeastern Asia, according to a bullentin from the National Geographic Society.

"As a capital city, Bangkok is not old," says the writer. "The new Rama I bridge, its enormous spans etched sharply against a background of colorful temples and waterfront shops, gives the city its date line. This 475-foot structure, first to link the two portions of the city, was dedicated in April, 1932, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the founding of Bangkok and the reign of the present Chakkri dynasty.

"In the 152 years, Bangkok has seen many changes. Up and down beyond the palaces and across the river the city has expanded; today it houses approximately 550,000 people. Well within the last half century, however, the Me Nam River, the leading commercial artery of the country was still Bangkok's main street, and a system of canals formed its cross streets.

"'Venice of the Orient,' people called the city then. Many of the older buildings continue to face the river, rather than the network of roads that has been cut through the ever-growing city. Most of the floating houses, once a feature along the river banks and cannals, now are numerous two and three story buildings lining the streets and alleys.

"New Road, the city's main thoroughfare, is an inelegant thing by day. All manner of buildings, from sun and rain wraped, open-front wooden shops to modern concrete structures, cluster along this narrow avenue of commerce. For miles the road seems to wander aimlessly on, bending first one way and then the other, paralleling the sinuous course of the river. Far too narrow now for all the jinrikshas, trucks, automobiles, hand-drawn carts and tides of humanity that surge into it, the street is congested even more by tramcar lines.

"One is impressed by the number of Chinese shops and the throngs of Chinese people that are everywhere in the Siamese capital. On side streets one can step into veritable Chinatowns. Elsewhere one finds miniature Indian centered about the silk goods, gem and curio trades. As the visitor becomes more intimately acquainted with Siam the answer to this foreign population becomes obvious. For centuries the Siamese have shown little inclination toward business, and have left it in the hands of outland people. More than 80 per cent of the Siamese are agriculturists, and the majority of the others are directly or indirectly connected with the government service. Only slightly more than 2 per cent are engaged in industrial pursuits.

"Several European business houses, marketing an incredible variety of goods, do a thrivinig trade in cosmopolitan Bangkok. Of course there are many Siamese stores, a few large, many small. Of the latter, the womenfolk often act as proprietors. It is sheer joy to go to a morning market of watch groups of Siamese women bargaining over prices of household commodities.

"If Bangkok's business throughfares seems too narrow and congested, the same cannot be said of her outlying residential roads, for they are wide avenues of asphalt of crushed rock, bordered with delightful canals. 'Flame of the forest' trees, ablaze with red blossoms from April to June, or majestic rain trees canopied overhead, form stately Gothic arches for mile after mile.

"What the capital's main street also lacks in interest, beyond the ebb and flow of its contrasting traffic, is more than recompensed for by its gorgeous wats or temples. Within the walled-in enclosures of the temple areas the Siamese have poured out the abundance of their artistic skill and found expression for their love of colors."

Mr. and Mrs. E. Russell of Yokohama, who have been visiting in Kobe during the past week, returned to Yokohama last Saturday.

The many friends of Mrs. F. M. Jonas regretted to learn that she is lying seriously ill after undergoing an operation on January 20th., and all are hoping for her complete recovery.

Mrs. E. Musgrove is lying in the International Hospital as a result of a broken leg—due to a fall on the icy pavement.

The foreign community of Kobe were hosts at a farewell dinner party in honor of His Excellency Governor Shirane, at the Kobe Club on January 22 Mr. F. W. Mackie, president of the Kobe Club, presided over the function, and also spoke a few words of farewell, to which the Governor responded. Mr. F. M. Jonas, chairman of the International Committee, translated the Governor's speech into English.

Tea was served at 3 a.m., and Mrs. Roy Smith opened up with a speech, also presenting Mrs. Shirane with a beautiful basket of flowers in the name of the three clubs as a token of appreciation for her friendship which the members were privileged to enjoy.

Mrs. Shirane responded. Mrs. Tasaki, president of the Kobe International Women's Club, followed with a speech. Mrs. Yuasa translated all the speeches in either English or Japanese.

Panama to Tax Oriental Shops

New Law Allows OneStore For Each 200 Foreigners, Sets High Levies On Rest

Chinese and East Indians engaged in business in Panama virtually are driven from the field by a law, unexpectedly approved by President Harmodio Arias in the closing minutes of the National Assembly's biennial session, which provides for nationalization of local commerce, according to a New York Herald Tribune report from Panama City.

The regulations and quotas apply to all nationalities, but it is generally recognized that their intent is to curb the activities of the Eastern merchants. East Indians here have a virtual monopoly on the extensive and fastgrowing tourist trade. The grocery business is controlled by the Chinese.

The law, effective immediately, specifies that for every 200 foreigners of determined nationality there may be one store registered officially. Thus, if there are 1,000 East Indians five stores will be permitted under resident in Panama, no more than normal tax regulations. Others may be operated, but prohibitive taxes make this impossible.

The effect of this legislation, if it is enforced, may be far-reaching. Front Street, most important center in Colon, for instance, is almost wholly taken up with Oriental shops. To force these merchants out overnight would be to leave vacant scores of stores which, unless there were a starting injection of Panamanian capital, would remain empty for months.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Parentless Baby

A baby born without either parent sounds incredible, but it happened recently in the case of little "Baby Nicky," born at the King's Mountain Memorial Hospital, Bristol, Va., October 24, 1934.

Little Nicky's father, Robert Nicholson, was drowned at Miami last summer. His mother died in the hospital, but the staff doctors, Delaney and Bowers, succeeded in saving the life of the child by a hurried Caesarian operation, about ten minutes after Mrs. Nicholson's death.

Rev. and Mrs. M. S. Kincheloe of Emory, Va., adopted the child and have christened him John Wesley Kincheloe.

THE V-8 ENGINE MAKES QUITE A DIFFERENCE

FIFTY miles or five hundred miles—the journey is never very far when you travel in a Ford. The smooth, powerful V-8 engine shortens the distance from Here to There . . . you glide over the miles without fuss or fatigue because of the easy-riding comfort of the car. And you'll say many a good word for it because it is so easy to handle in crowded traffic. . . . That is an important reason why so many women prefer a Ford. Its alert performance makes driving more pleasant and enjoyable. And contributes a great deal to your safety and peace of mind on every road.

Social and Personal Notes

MR. MIHARA IS A.A.U.W. SPEAKER

The history of prints was traced and famous prints were shown by Mr. Shigeichi Mihara is an address University Women at the home of before the American Association of Mrs. E. L. Neville Saturday afternoon.

"Painting," Mr. Mihara declared, "is undoubtedly the oldest human culture. From the decorations on the walls of the caves in Japan, we know that this is so. In this respect, the East and West are the same for after the glacial period, the people of both the East and West lived in caves and on the walls of the caves began their painting."

He said that the early prints in Japan were associated with the Buddhist religion for they were of Buddhist sutras and then later, Buddhist images were printed on paper. He showed photographs of some of the earliest prints.

The next period of the prints was that of book illustration. At this time, they were popular and they were done in black and white. Mr. Mihara stressed the point that the prints were available to the poorer people. Pillar prints were sold for a few cents and these were mounted and hung in the tokonoma or pasted on the pillar in the room if there were no tokonoma.

These prints were made on long and narrow strips of paper. The next step in their development was the application of lacquer and their use in the Boys' Festival

Speaking of the simple black and white prints which were taken from rubbings of sculptured stone designs, Mr. Mihara remarked on their likeness to the wood prints which are popular in America and Europe today and said that because they have come from the West, they have been taken up by people of Japan who do not always stop to realize that they had the same thing 300 years ago.

Mr. Mihara gave his interpretation of the meaning of the word Ukiyo, about which he said there has been much discussed by print dealers and artists. He believed that it was originally a school of prints and that it came from the name of three famous artists of the 16th century whose family names were Ukiyo.

Mr. Mihara traced the development of color in prints and showed a large number of prints from his collections. Miss Edith Kettlewell, president of the organization, presided and Mr. Mihara was introduced by Miss Mary Chappell, chairman of the program committee.

Ex-Convict Leaves U.S. To Marry After 25 Yrs.

might experience a change of heart when they met again, even though he is forty-seven now and Maria is forty-one.

Says Beauty Is In Heart

"My years in prison taught me that beauty is not in the face or figure," he said, confidently. "It is one's heart that makes for beauty. She has waited for me and written to me all these years and I am sure we will be very happy."

He was sorry to leave the United States without building a better record for himself, but that was part of the bargain which brought him his pardon. Gentilcore probably will never attempt to return. Marie would not want to come, even if it were possible, he said.

His years in prison left him philosophical rather than embittered, he said.

"The world grows better and people are kindlier," he said. "Even the guards in prison are kinder and try to help a man more than they did in my first years. But human nature changes little. When I went to prison people were talking about the next great European war. And now they talk about the next one.

"But it is wonderful to be free again. Do you know, on the way here I saw an airplane!"

It seemed a strange enthusiasm until he explyained he had never seen a machine in flight before.

Pope Begs Peace; Deplores Arming

Prays To God To 'Disperse' People Who Want War In Xmas Address

A formidable attack against pagan tendencies in present-day Germany was delivered by Pope Pius XI on December 24 in an allocution to the Sacred College of Cardinals in reply to Christmas wishes offered to him in the name of all the Cardinals by the dean of the college, Cardinal Pignatelli. The Pope said the spread of paganism was so terrible a thing that it made him fear divine justice might strike the persons responsible for so grave an offense against God and he invited all the faithful to pray for the souls of those who were so blinded that they did not see the error of their ways.

Among distressing developments the Pope also placed in the first rank the renewed rumors of war and warlike preparations. All nations contend that their armaments are intended for purely defensive purposes, he added, and he sincerely hoped this was the case. For if it were not and if there really were some who preferred war to peace then he would feel called upon to address to God a prayer to "disperse the people who want war."

Rejoices in Holy Year

The Pope began his allocution by an expression of his joy over the spiritual benefits enjoyed by all Christendom through the extension of the Holy Year to the whole world.

"This application of redemption to such a vast number of souls," he said, "has been most providential at a time when currents are unleashed in the world contrary to redemption—currents that after nineteen centuries of redemption, seem to be a new proclamation of moral paganism, social paganism and State paganism, if such an expression may be used.

"These are horrible things, which really make us fear some grave, some formidable reply on the part of the mercy of God which will do justice to so many souls that appear to be immersed in the sleep of death. It is for this reason that we remind all the good children of redemption, who enjoy the fruits of redemption, of the necessity to pray for so many souls that have been blinded and so miserably deprived of the pleasure of redemption."

These remarks were taken to be aimed at Germany. They do not apply, for instance, to Russia, which is against religion of all kinds, but rather apply to the Reich, which is the only country in which an effort is being made to revive ancient pagan forms of worship.

The Pope also expressed the greatest satisfaction with the results of the Eucharistic Congresses at Buenos Aires and Melbourne, which he said have been a great consolation to him.

"This consolation," he added, "is all the greater and necessary at a time when, alas—one might almost say out of a spirit of infernal reprisals—so man yoffenses have been committed by blind, perverse souls against our Lord, Jesus, Christ."

The International Juridical Congress recently held under the auspices of the Vatican was mentioned by the Pope as a cause of great consolation because it "reminded the whole world of the immense benefits it derived by receiving the code of Christian laws from the Catholic church." This reminder is particularly necessary now, said the Pope, when "expressions are so plentiful which speak of racial rights and national rights as if rights of justice may be founded on particular rights."

"It is justice alone that judgest everything," he added, "so that Cicero himself, though a pagan, was able to understand through his intelligence and good sense that it is not the law that creates justice, but justice that creates the law."

Refers to Depression

The recent restoration of the Loretto Sanctuary gave the Pontiff occasion to ask the faithful to pray to the Virgin Mary to intercede for God's mercy on a world still so sorely tried by the universal depression.

"All the tribulations, all the trials and all the ills that derive from this crisis in all directions in public and private life," he said, "are increased by the confused but widespread rumors of war and warlike preparations. It is a thing that confuses one and before which our spirits remain dumbfounded. And we are at the very eve of the day on which the augural canticle spread over the world, "Glory to God in Heaven, peace on earth, to men good-will.'"

The Pope concluded:

"Most beloved children, never has this canticle had greater reason to become our prayer, our unceasing supplication, than it has today, as tomorrow it will be on the lips of the whole church spread all over the globe because this truly is our prayer, our thought and our most profound desire. It is said, 'If you wish peace prepare for war,' by which is meant that in all these armaments we are to see but a precaution, a guarantee against war. We wish to believe this because too terrible would be the reality contrary to this desire.

"If peace is truly desired we invoke peace, we bless peace, we pray for peace. If by chance there should be some who, owing to the new phenomeno of suicidal and homicidal mania, truly prefer war to peace then we have another prayer which it will become our duty to utter and we would say to the Blessed Lord, 'disperse the people who want war.'

"However we wish always to have in our heart and on our lips the other prayer and with that we wish to reply to your greetings and your filial wishes:

"'Glory to God in Heaven and peace on earth—peace, peace, peace!'"

Einstein Has New View Of Mass-Energy Problem

said:

"This is also a question that cannot be answered. In former days it was the belief of scientists that you could verify the principle of casualty in this sense: that if you are given an initial state, and observe it, and if you know the laws of nature, then you can predict the state of the system in future time.

"But Heisenberg has shown that this is not the cause, for we cannot observe the initial state without influencing the state of the system in a way unknown to us, and that makes it impossible to know the initial state, and likewise the final state, and consequently you cannot verify the law of causality experimentally.

"With this the question is not answered, because you can ask whether the final state has a deterministic form or only a probbility form. The answer to this nobody can know, but I know that most physicists believe that the final form of our physical law is statistical (non-deterministic). I believe in a deterministic form. So does Max Planck (father of the quantum theory).

Sees Deterministic Form

"If you cannot observe the state of a system, you connot even ask whether it is deterministic or not. But this is largely a matter of taste. I believe that our physical laws will in the end be stated in a deterministic form, but most physicists do not believe so." And he chuckled again.

"Do not most students of relativity believe in a deterministic system, while students of the quantum mechanics believe in a probability system?" he was asked.

"It is impossible at present," he answered, "to define relativity in probability terms, and impossible also to define probabiliy in relativity terms. The two theories each seem to contain a great deal of truth, but at present they are mutually exclusive."

In answer to the question on whether the universe in still finite and curved, Dr. Einstein explained that it was now impossible to be certain whether space was infinite or finite, with the chances being good that it was infinite.

"It all depends," he said, "upon the question whether the curvature of space was positive or negative. At the beginning of the relativity theory the hypothesis was made that the mean density of matter is constant in time, and if that is the case matter must be finite in space.

Dramatic Scene in Theatre

"Now we know that the mean density of matter is not constant in time, and experimental evidence is lacking at present to tell whether space has a positive or a negative curvature. If it is positive the universe must be finite. If it is negative then the universe is infinite."

He expressed the hope that the 200-inch telescope to be erected on Mount Palomar in California might throw light on the question.

Long before the time scheduled for the lecture this afternoon the auditorium of the Little Theatre was jammed. Sharply at 4.30 the curtain rose and Dr. Einstein stood revealed before two illuminated blackboards, upon which he had written his latest hieroglyphics translating his universe.

To those who understood them the hieroglyphics appeared like the score of a magnificent symphony.

Lowell Sherman Dies On The Coast

Actor And Film Director Who Had Many Successes On Broadway Was 49

Lowell Sherman, film director and actor, died of pneumonia at a hospital at Hollywood on December 28, according to a story in the New York Times. He was 49 years old.

Mr. Sherman, who directed Mae West in "She Done Him Wrong" and Katharine Hepburn in "Morning Glory," was ordered to the hospital the Thursday previous from the Pathe studio, where he was directing an all-color picture. He had suffered from laryngitis for the last year and had all but lost his voice. He had a habit of dressing lightly, wearing shorts and an open-front shirt while he worked under the hot lights on the sound stages.

Known to Many Cities

Although connected with Hollywood and its works for the last ten years, Mr. Sherman had a long and successful career on the stage of Broadway and of those of a timetable list of cities, ranging from Philadelphia, Baltimore and Bridgeport to Providence, Milwaukee and other points east and west.

As an actor, he had the advantage of heredity as well as his own considerable ability. His grandmother, Kate Gray, played soubrette roles wih Booth, and his mother, Julia Louise Gray, left the stage only when he was born. His father was a theatrical manager and, at various times, conducted the Baldwin Theatre in San Francisco and the Union Square Theatre in Los Angeles.

Mr. Sherman was born in San Francisco on Oct. 11, 1885. He was educated in New York and made his debut in a John Mack vaudeville sketch. Later he transferred his allegiance to stock, appearing in a Milwaukee company in which Pauline Lord was a star, Ruth Chatterton an ingenue and Lenore Ulric a super. In the Union Hill stock company, of later vintage, Jane Cowl was a fellow-player.

His first considerable success was in "The Commuters." This was followed by such Broadway plays as "The Heart of a Follies Girl," "Mad Hour," "The Whip," "Angel Face," "Satan in Sables," "Evidence," "General Crack" and "Ladies of Leisure."

Villain in "Way Down East"

One of his first films was D. W. Griffith's "Way Down East," in which he appeared as the villain and Richard Bathelmess was the juvenile. He continued to be the mustache-twirling enemy of the angelic young women of the silent films in "Mad Hour," "The Whip, Woman," "Angel Face," "The Garden of Eden," "The Scarlet Dove" and many other films of a decade ago.

With the advent of the talking picture, Mr. Sherman's talents found another mode of expression other than the callous lift of an eyebrow, the sinister curl of a lip. He served as the sophisticated, polished, suave and witty man of the world.

The talking pictures did more than wrest him from the ranks of villainy. His stage experience was of such value that he received an opportunity to direct pictures. Among them were "Nearly Divorced," "The Royal Bed," "Bachelor Apartment," "High Stakes," "The Greeks Had a Word for Them" and "Ladies of the Jury." Better known, however, are his films, "Morning Glory," which proved Katherine Hepburn's claim to stardom, and "She Done Him Wrong," the picture that made Mae West one of the most popular stars of the day.

Mr. Sherman recently completed the direction of Universal's film of Thorne Smith's "Night Life of the Gods," which is scheduled for exhibition early next year.

He was thrice married, each union ending in a divorce. His first wife, Mrs. Evelyn Booth Sherman, sued for divorce in Rhode Island in 1922. He married Pauline Garon, actress, in 1926, but the marriage was dissolved in 1930. Later that year he married Helene Costello, daughter of Maurice Costello. She obtained a divorce in May, 1932.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Unbelievable Finger Strength

Gregory Paradise, Canadian strong man who now lives in Nashua, New Hampshire, performs many unbelievable feats of strength and has won several international physical culture contests. But I think the most unusual of his accomplishments is that of chinning himself in perfect style from a dead hang by the middle finger of his right hand. Most people find it quite difficult to chin themselves using both hands and arms.

Azana Acquitted In Spanish Revolt

Ex-Premier And Secretary Are Freed As Evidence Against Them Is Held Inadequate

After carefully considering all evidence presented by the Attorney General against the former Socialist Premier Manuel Azana and his former secretary, Luis Bello, the Spanish Supreme Court on December 28 decided there was no grounds for an indictment. Orders were telegraphed to Barcelona for the immediate release of the two according to the New Times' Madrid correspondent.

They were arrested last Oct. 9 on suspicion of being implicated in the Catalan rebellion. They had been prisoners even since in Barcelona Harbor on board the steamer Uruguay, which was converted by the military authorities into a temporary prison ship for the detention of several hundred Catalan revolutionist.

Both Senor Azana and Senor Bello were extreme Left Deputies in the Cortes, but it was decided that immunity from arrest did not apply to parliamentarians suspected of being revolutionists. They were examined by a special magistrate who boarded the Uruguay last Oct. 18.

Implicated in Gun Running

There were two charges against Senor Azana. He was accused also of implication in gun running that took place in Asturias last Summer.

advices from Barcelona said Senores Azana and Bello were freed early this evening.

Although the Supreme Court did not find sufficient evidence to bring the two to trial, the Attorney General will continue his investigation into the Asturian gun-running, which he hopes will justify Senor Azana's re-arrest.

Horacio Echevarrieta, a close friend of Senor Azana and an industrialist from Bilbao, which the former Premier represented in the Cortes, has been indicted in connection with the gun-running in Asturias. The Attorney General has asked five years' imprisonment for Senor Echevarrieta.

MRS. BURTON RETURNS

Mrs. Elizabeth Eaton Burton, American artist, returned to Tokyo Monday from China where she held successful art exhibitions in Peiping and Shanghai. She will give a similar exhibition here although at present she has not had time to set the date.

Mrs. Burton's forthcoming exhibit will show the work she did during her two months in China and several months in Japan last summer and spring.

It is Mrs. Burton's opinion that she has absorbed sufficiently of Oriental culture and beauty in her tour to keep her supplied with ideas for a long time to come. Japan she describes for its charm and China for its grandeur. Her paintings reveal that she has caught the spirit of both countries in her works.

Mrs. Burton's home is at Santa Barbara, California, although she was born of American parentage in Paris. A daughter of the late Charles Frederick Eaton, also a painter and collector, Mrs. Burton was educated in France amid a tradition of art and literature. After completing her education in France, she returned to the United States and established a studio of fine arts in Santa Barbara, California, where she designed and carried out in her work-shops murals, hangings and screens for many parts of America. She has held a number of exhibitions on both the east and west coasts.

For her work in the field of French literature and art and the spread of French culture in the United States, she was recently decorated by the French government with the Academic Palms.

Asked her opinion of the so-called modern school of painting, Mrs. Burton expressed the view that it is more applicable, that is, the extremely modern school, to the plastic and decorative arts as well as in use with fabrics and leathers. She feels it is most highly suitable to decorative leathers where she has employed the modern school technique.

In her work with Oriental themes Mrs. Burton has used legends and poems to give her pictorials a touch which no other artist has done. This no doubt will be one of the biggest contributions she will make to fine arts in the Far East. Mrs. Bertha Lum, well known painter who resides in Peiping, says that the greatest interest in Mrs. Burton's work is not in the scenes of temples and courtyards, well done though some of these are, but in the more fanciful subjects where she has seen beyond the surface to something that is nearer the spirit of the Orient.

WOMEN'S CLUB

A talk on women writers among Englishwomen will be given before the Tokyo Women's club Monday afternoon by Mr. Pickering, an Englishman who is in Tokyo this winter teaching in a local university.

BRIDGE OLYMPIC

Mrs. D. D. MacGregor and Miss Tony Wong who captured the East-West title in the World-Bridge Olympics held in Tokyo last winter, are expected to defend their positions when the 1935 world Bridge Olympic is started at the American club at 8 p.m. Friday, according to Mr. F. M. Gibson, Tokyo director.

Entries received at present are sufficient for six tables although it is expected about 12 tables will be entered.

Mr. Gibson has announced the following rules which are the same as last year except that the results will be known sooner. The International Committee has sent to Mr. Gibson the pars for the 16 hands. Therefore, on the day after the bidding, he will be able to announce the correct offensive and defensive bidding. He will be able to announce unofficial results at once rather than wait two months for word from New York as was necessary last year.

In the present Olympics, any system of bidding can win. The hands to be played are those selected by the master minds of bridge who have decided on the correct bidding and play for each hand.

The rules of the Olympics, according to Mr. Gibson, are as follows:

The conduct of play will be the same as last year. Mr. Gibson and a committe of non-players will open the envelope containing the printed lists of hands shortly before 8 p.m. and will place the cards in duplicate boards numbered from 1 to 16. The contestants will take the places marked for them. Throughout the evening the North-South pairs will remain seated and the East-West pairs will progress after each hand to the table next higher in number, 1 to 2, 3 to 4, 12 to 1, etc. Before and after playing each hand, the players should count their cards. After the play, each player should return the cards he held to the pocket in the duplicate board from which he drew them. The North player at each table will then take the board to the next lowest table, 4 to 3, 3 to 2, 2 to 1, 1 to 12, etc. Vulnerability or non-vulnerability is shown on the duplicate boards.

Condon's Plea To Kidnaper Is Made Public

Letter Addressed To Bronx Paper March 7, 1932, Led To Contact With Abductor

The letter by which Dr. John F. Condon, retired schoolteacher of the Bronx, injected himself into the Lindbergh kidnaping case, the letter which led finally to the passing of $50,000 of Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh's money to a man the Colonel has identified by his voice as Bruno Richard Hauptmann, was made public on January 5 by "The Bronx Home News."

The letter, addressed to the editor of the newspaper, was written March 7, 1932, six days after Charles A. Lindbergh jr. was kidnaped from the home of the parents near Hopewell, N. J. Its principal features were published in "The Bronx Home News" the following day.

Dr. Condon, who had been writing letters to the newspapers for many years on subjects which aroused his sympathy, obviously was profoundly moved by the abduction of the Lindbergh child. He felt it as an affront to his national pride, as a cruelty practiced upon American motherhood and, most of all, apparently as a challenge to himself, a man who prided himself upon his ability to solve any problem which piqued his interest.

Appealed to Abductor's Manhood

He appealed in the letter to the manhood of the abductor, to his humanity, to his religious faith and to his cupidity, volunteering to add $1,000, "all that I could scrape together," to the $50,000 which Colonel Lindberg (sic) had offered for the return of his son. He also promised that, if the bargain were kept, he, Dr. John F. Condon, would not testify against the kidnaper. The letter follows:

"2974 Decatur Avenue,
"Bronx, N. Y. C., March 7, 1932.
"Editor of Home News:

"I have followed your columns since the pioneer days and I now ask you to go over beyond the realms of 'journalism,' into speculative philosophy for the benefit of Colonel Charles A. Lindberg's kid child. (The word "kid" was crossed out by a single line.—Ed.)

"I have written stories the contents of which have been drawn from first-handed sources, and I have never betrayed a confidence.

"Even now one of those stories is being considered in a Western town with a view to publication. With a view to assisting the brave colonel and his devoted wife, Mrs. Lindberg to bring back to her bosom the offspring, with his tiny arms about her neck, with his little fingers causing that joy, which offers no parallel in the world and which only a mother can experience, I make an offer to the kidnapers, with instruction as to how to proceed to restore the beautiful baby to its mother's arms.

"I offer $1,000 cash for any one, who can prove to my satisfaction, in the history of the world where a Catholic priest has ever betrayed the secrets of the confessional.

"It is upon this universal that I wish to help Colonel Lindberg as follows:

"To the Kidnaper:

"In addition to the $50,000 offered by the colonel, I offer $1,000, which I have saved from my salary, if the one who handed the colonel's son out of the window to the man on the ladder (surmised) [this word, between parenthesis in the original was then crossed out with diagonal lines.—Ed.] will go to a 'Catholic priest' and confess his or her transgression, giving the child unharmed to any priest whom the kidnaper will name.

"I stand ready in person at my own expense to go anywhere, alone, on land or water to give the kidnaper the extra money, and promise never to utter his or her name to any one.

"I appeal for the mother of the child, for the sake of Him who suffered at Mount Calvary, before His mother, who suffered anguish and whose heart was pierced with sorrow. Instead of threats and thoughts of punishment for the erring one, I appeal to the inner soul of the man or woman.

"For the sake of his own mother, that he may offer restitution for his crime, I offer all that I could scrape together, $1,000 of my own money, so that a loving mother may again have her darling child, so that people will know that the greatest criminal in the world has a bright spot in his head, and that Colonel Charles A. Lindberg may know that the American people, of whom I claim to be one, are grateful for the honor that he bestowed upon the United States by his pluck and daring.

"Let the kidnaper, who may be here among us, know that I write of my own free will, that no testimony of mine or coming from me will be used against him, and that this is an appeal for the sake of humanity, while I give all that I can to him, $1,000, just for being manly by giving back the child to his mother.

"JOHN F. CONDON."

However unconventional his appeal to the kidnaper may have been, Dr. Condon's letter got results. His epistle might not have appealed to a racketeer, but on March 9, 1932, the day after its general purport was published by "The Bronx Home News," Dr. Condon got his first response from the man to whom he paid Colonel Lindbergh's $50,000 on April 2, 1932, in St. Raymond's Cemetery, the Bronx.

Not Surprised at Response

It was no great surprise, apparently, to Dr. Condon. For a great many years he had prided himself on the wiles by which he outwitted his school children, on the mentality which enabled him to outline lucidly for them problems which they had found baffling. He undoubtedly would have been both pained and astonished had he failed to get a reply to his appeal in "The Bronx Home News."

On March 9, 1932, he had his interview with Colonel Lindbergh at the latter's home near Hopewell, N.J., and, to the astonishment of every one except Dr. Condon himself, it was found that the signature of the note he had received identified it as the work of the kidnaper who had left the ransom note on the window will of the nursery at the Hopewell estate the night of March 1, 1932.

Thereafter, with the complete confidence of Colonel Lindbergh, Dr. Condon conducted negotiations by means of personal advertisements in "The Bronx Home News" until the tragic fiasco of the payment of the ransom money.

The utter collapse of his solution of the case with the discovery of the murdered baby's body on May 12, 1932, was a blow from which Dr. Condon apparently never rallied completely. It never has been really clear whether he actually identified Hauptmann as the man to whom he handed Colonel Lindbergh's money and with whom he previously had had an hour's conversation in the dark. The authorities were inclined, apparently, to give Dr. Condon the cold shoulder after Hauptmann's arrest.

Flaws In British Social Service System Found

relations between capital and labor on the basis of collective bargaining are much further advanced in Great Britain than in the United States?"

Replies to President

Early in his report, Mr. Gall referred to the President's questions and said:

"My observation is that collective agreements in England are far less the result of internal politics and 'horse-trading' than our N. R. A. codes have been, and the facts are respected at every stage."

Referring to one of the latest clashes in England over social insurance, Mr. Gall, who was present at the opening of the British Parliament on November 21, quoted from a statement made by Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald in referring to critics:

"'The great weakness of unemployment schemes up to now has been that none of them differentiated enough in the character of the unemployed. Unemployment in the whole is a mass of a thousand and one problems, sometimes applying to individuals and not to a group of individuals at all.'"

Germany Found Again To Have Large Air Fleet

Fast Commercial Planes Can Be Quickly Adapted For War Use

The rising clamor in Great Britain for greater protection against hostile aircraft, as a result of her bitter experience in the World War, was increased today by revelations in the authoritative Jane's "All the World's Aircraft" that Germany was again a potential air power, says a London despatch to the New York Herald Tribune dated Jan. 5.

Statements that the Reich has a vast fleet of high-speed commercial planes under strict government control and quickly adaptable to war purposes are contained in the annual publication, a sister volume to the recognized encyclopedia of the naval world, "Jane's Fighting Ships."

Germany Withholds Data

The book devotes more than 500 pages to detailed descriptions of the world's commercial and fighting craft. Germany alone, of all the nations mentioned, refused to supply information on its latest designs in planes and motors, according to C. G. Grey, editor.

"This year's volume," Mr. Grey writes, "can give relatively little information about the latest German airplanes and airmotors. The German firms have only been able to send us information concerning well known commercial types.

"Whatever may be the truth in the stories of the production of vast quantities of high-speed bombers and fighters in Germany, there is no getting away from the fact that the best German commercial planes and mail carriers could, with very little modification, be made into war machines. And we know that their high-speed mail carriers habitually travel between Germany and Spain at a speed very close to 200 miles an hour.

"In Germany all air transport has been amalgamated under the Deutsche Lufthansa, which is more closely under government control than it has been in the past."

Commercial Planes Outstrip Armies

Germany is not alone, however, in having a commercial air fleet that is a potential menace to rival powers in time of war, Mr. Grey remarks. Virtually every country finds itself in the awkward position of seeing its pet fighting planes outstripped both in speed and range by the latest commercial models.

"In 1934 we have had a whole crop of low-wing cabin monoplanes with tapered wings, many of them with retractable landing carriages," the author writes. "At the end of the year there was hardly an airplane in the flying services of any nation which had any of those up-to-date characteristics.

"Many manufacturers are prepared to offer for sale to foreign nations new types which they are supplying in their own country. Certain English planes sold abroad actually are faster than those sold at home because they are built free from official specifications."

Altogether twenty-eight countries are building planes judged worthy of description in the book, the United States heading the list with 144 fighting and commercial models. France lists 118 models, Great Britain 111, Italy, fifty-four; Germany, thirty-seven; Holland, twenty-five; Poland, twenty; Japan, nineteen; Rumania, eleven and Russia, ten.

Only six pages are devoted to airships, of which Germany and the United States occupy four.

France to Copy U. S. Air Force

France has planned to build her air fleet hereafter on the American system, says a Paris report to the same journal. Senator Amory de La Grange member of the Senate's Aeronautical Committee, revealed that the findings of a commission which toured plants in the United States would form the basis for France's earnest effort to raise her aviation establishment into the ranks of the world's best.

More pilots and more and better planes are on the scheduled planned by General Victor Denain, Air Minister. He has said it will take until 1936 to build and buy the ships he needs, but he already is out after the good pilots.

The air commission of the Chamber of Deputies has adopted a proposal to provide pilots without waiting for the period necessary to train them. It authorizes reserve flying officers to be transferred at once back into the active army for periods up to ten years.

General Denain recently told the Senate he had sent a mission of Air Corps officers and technical experts to the United States to make a study of the airplane industry. He said that the government already had purchased several fast American planes for experimental purposes, and that it would attempt to obtain licenses to make them in France.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Clock That Runs Backwards

A few years ago Ruth Zander of Brooklyn, attended a Traubenfest at which she took a chance on a clock raffle and won the clock I pictured in my cartoon. It ran fine for a while; then she noticed it was running backwards. It keeps good time, but Miss Zander must get accustomed to reading 8 o'clock as 4, 9 o'clock as 3, and so on.

Dog That Reads Only German

Dr. A. J. Glaser of Comfort, Texas, claims to have a setter dog that can actually read, but only the German language. The proof of the contention is borne out by the fact that the Doctor always takes the Texas Free Press, German newspaper of the state of Texas, and his wonder dog always selects that particular paper from the assortment of newspapers on the floor, delivering it to his master on command.

Vienna Cuts Budget Drastically For 1935

Salaries Reduced 50 Per Cent; No Relief For Taxpayers

The city of Vienna has had a drastic cut in its budget reducing it by about 40 per cent for 1935.

Expenditures of every sort are to be greatly diminished, according to the Christian Science Monitor. The highest city officials will receive less than half as much as during the current year, while the sums for teachers and city employees are to be smaller than for many years.

The regular budget contains almost nothing for building and improvements, but a special fund has been formed for that purpose. Less will be spent on the street cars, the city electricity, gas and water works and on practically all municipal enterprises.

Thirty-four per cent of the total budget goes for welfare purposes and 19 per cent for schools. While practically all taxes are as high as they were when Vienna was in the hands of the Socialists and some even higher, the treasury receipts are greatly reduced, due largely to the general economic situation.

Despite drastic retrenchments, there is no appreciable relief for the bulk of taxpayers. Economic exigencies make no discrimination between a Vienna Government of "Reds" and a Vienna controlled by a dictator.

Young Senator Cannot Enter Senate Till June

The powerful Democratic steering committee and the policy committee met on Dec. 31 in joint session. They canvassed the case of youthful Senator-elect Rush D. Holt of West Virginia who is under the 30-year constitutional age limitation, and of Bronson Cutting, Republican, who narrowly won reelection in New Mexico with a contest in prospect from his unsuccessful Democratic rival.

They decided that Mr. Holt must wait until he is 30 before he can be seated. That will be next June. That will probably eliminate him from this session of Congress. It is understood Mr. Holt acquiesces.

TOKYO UNION CHURCH DINNER

Mr. and Mrs. John Struthers who have just returned to Tokyo from a visit to their former home in Scotland, were welcomed and feted at a dinner meeting of the members and friends of the Tokyo Union church in the community hall of the church Tuesday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Struthers, popular members of the foreign community of Tokyo, have lived in Japan about 30 years and Mr. Struthers, a retired business man, was for many years treasurer of the Tokyo Union church. He was also active in founding the church and was a member of the building committee.

Dr. T. A. Young presided at the dinner which was attended by about 90 persons. Among the speakers on the program was Miss Mildred Julian, teacher at the American school, who spoke in an entertaining manner of the amusing experiences she encountered the summer when she volunteered to teach in a remote mountain school in Kentucky.

Miss Isabel Alexander, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. P. Alexander of Aoyama Gakuin, had charge of the music program which included community singing. She led the group in singing of two old fashioned "founds" for which she supplied Japanese words. "Are You Sleeping," and "John Brown's Body," sung with the dinner group with Japanese words, proved popular.

Before the singing of the hymn, "I Would Be True," Miss Alexander recounted an interesting historical sketch of this song.

"Few people know it," Miss Alexander said, "but this song was written in Japan. The author was Mr. Howard Arnold Walter who at that time was a teacher at Waseda University. He wrote the song as a Christmas greeting to his mother in America in 1906 and at that time he had no idea it would become a beloved hymn. His mother thought the words so beautiful that she sent them to Harper's magazine and latter they were adopted for a hymn. Mr. Walter died while still a young man in India."

The musical program also included flute solos by Dr. Mak Carrott, a member of the Southern Baptist Mission who is now studying Japanese at the School for Japanese Language and Culture at the city Y.M.C.A.

Mrs. Struthers spoke briefly and in his talk, Mr. Struthers declared that the marvelous development of broadcasting was the outstanding he enjoyed while visiting in Scotland. He spoke of the significant strides which religion has made as a result of the advancement of the radio and said that today one can enjoy a splendid church sermon while sitting at home by the fireside.

The three broadcasts which he enjoyed most during his absence were those of the royal wedding in London when the whispered words, "I do" and "I will" came distinctly and thrillingly over the air, of the special service when the British Association for the Advancement of Science met in Aberdeen, and that of the farewell address of the retiring head of the Salvation Army.

Mr. and Mrs. Struthers declared that they are back in Tokyo for a year at least and perhaps two years. They are living at 6 of 450 Sankocho, Shirokane, Shiba-ku.

Mrs. McFarland Hale was in charge of the dinner and member of her committee were Mrs. A. G. Jillard, Mrs. E. T. Horn, Mrs. V. T. Armstrong, Mrs. Howard Hannaford, Mrs. C. W. Iglehart, Mrs. T. A. Young, Mrs. H. Thede, and Mrs. F. S. Thomas.

Laval and Duce Pledge Peace And Friendship

Rome Parley Speeds Accord, Paris Denies Assent To Free Hand In Ethiopia

Toasts to the future collaboration of France and Italy in the interests of European peace—accompanied, however, by astute assurances that neither intended to desert its friends among the smaller powers—were drunk in sparkling Italian wine on January 5 by Premier Benito Mussolini and Pierre Laval, French Foreign Minister, at a formal dinner in the Palazzo Venezia. Mr. Joseph B. Phillips of the New York Herald Tribune gives the following account:

In their speeches both statesmen referred to the coming together of the two countries after years of misunderstanding as an event which had long been overdue, but prophesied that an accord reached here would be only the beginning of effective harmony.

The dinner and reception at the palace, given by Il Duce to his guest, with 1,000 citizens in attendance, concluded an arduous day. Except for luncheon, which the distinguished conferees had with King Victor Emmanuel III and Queen Helena at Quirinal Palace, the day was devoted almost entirely to attempts to reduce good intentions to practical form, in the shape of a colonial agreement and an accord on Danubian policy which later will be acceptable to other interested powers.

Signor Mussolini, who, through most of his dictatorship since 1922, has pursued a policy hostile to France, was the first to raise his glass at the end of the dinner tonight. He said:

"We have worked not only to bring about agreement on particular questions concerning our two countries, but also to reaffirm the ideals which come from our community of origin and of which the people have the greatest need in times of uncertainty such as the present.

"It is not a question, so far as central Europe is concerned, of renouncing our respective friendships. It is a question of harmonizing in the Danubian basin the interests and vital necessities of each state with the exigencies of the general situation for the purpose of European peace."

The visit of M. Laval, said the Premier, should "establish the first meeting ground" of interest of the two countries. So far as other countries were concerned, "our accords can not and should not be interpreted as contrary to or exclusive of the interests of other powers who desire to bring their collaboration to the work we have begun," he concluded.

Laval Hails New Spirit

In his reply M. Laval made equally clear that he also considered the work undertaken here more as a beginning than as a finished accomplishment.

Obviously, the fact that their first step toward bringing the conflicting forces of the Danubian basin into harmony has been somewhat halting, was present in the minds of both speakers. The French visitor echoed the sentiment of his host in saying that Franco-Italian organization of policy was a necessity.

"We have wished to regulate the questions which concerned us alone," said M. Laval. "We have also wished to look for harmony on the principal problems of general policy. The world follows our efforts with passionate interest. All those who are animated by the ideals of peace today have their eyes turned towards home.

"I speak in the name of France, which does not follow any egotistical ends. She has her legitimate desires for security, but she intends to undertake her part in the necessary work of the reconciliation of peoples.

"Recently at Geneva the rifts of conflict were avoided, but peace remains precarious. It requires our careful attention. The common people do not want to wait any longer. They live in incertitude and too often in misery."

Colonial Experts Busy

The series of business conversations between M. Laval and Il Duce began shortly after 9 o'clock this morning, when the French minister called at the Palazzo Venezia and remained two hours. Count Charles de Chambrun, the French Ambassador, and Fulvio Suvich, Italian Undersecretary of State, were present.

Meanwhile, the experts on colonial questions for the two governments were in session at the Italian Foreign Office. Later Signor Suvich paid an unscheduled visit to M. Laval at the latter's hotel and stayed so long that the French minister was late for a tea given for the French colony of Rome.

So far as could be learned tonight, these extended conversations clarified to a considerable extent the prospects of a colonial agreement and also the chances for working out a formula for a non-interference pact in central Europe which would have a fair prospect of acceptance by the other interested powers.

M. Laval had a private audience with the King before the luncheon at the royal palace. At the luncheon, Laval and Mussolini, both former Socialists, sat respectively at the right and left hand of the Queen. They were reported to have been in excellent spirits.

Diplomatic conversations will begin early tomorrow morning and neither statesman has any other engagement until late in the afternoon. The conversations probably will be continued on Monday, after the French Foreign Minister has had an audience with Pope Pius XI.

Reports that the two statesmen already have been able to agree on all the details of a proposed non-intervention pact for central Europe, or even on the whole Franco-Italian colonial question, were described in informal circles tonight as "the optimism of ignorance."

Body 'Reserves' Defeat Fatigue, Scientists Told

Rush To Aid So Man Can Go 'Till He Drops,' Scientists Are Told At Pittsburgh

Why a man can "go till he drops" under stress, seemingly throwing off fatigue, is explained in a new way by experiments reported recently to the American Association for the Advancement of Science, according to a story in the New York Times.

The same experiments show now and why one can do some kinds of mental work better when he is tired at night than when fresh in the morning. They were described by Professor H. M. Johnson of American University, Washington, and Dr. G. E. Welgand of Mellon Institute.

Both things are explained by the fact that the human body is a compensating mechanism. Like an army in battle, it is so organized that reserves can be rushed from one point where there is no danger to another part of the line where the enemy is pressing hard.

The experimenters found that a group of college students whom they tested throughout an entire school year could do a fairly difficult puzzle on the average 14 per cent better at night than on the morning of the same day, and 11.7 per cent better at night than on the morning of the following day.

They gained in skill during the long working day when, theoretically at least, fatigue poisons were accumulating in their body tissues and their fuel reserves decreasing, but lost skill overnight, when, supposedly, the poisons were removed and new fuel manufactured.

What happened in the body, said the scientists, was that parts that were not working hard gave extra help to parts under strain, and this explained the seeming paradox.

Smoke Safest After Coffee

Inhaling cigarette smoke and drinking black coffee have opposite effects on the human body, the association was told. Coffee soothes the cigarette's effect.

The best time to smoke cigarettes if one inhales and wants to avoid increased unsteadiness of his hands and a much faster pulse is right after drinking two cups of black coffee, it was reported by Professor A. L. Winsor and E. I. Strongin of Cornell University.

They found that inhaling the smoke of one cigarette while smoking it over a period of about ten minutes caused "marked unsteadiness" of the smoker's hands while he was smoking and for about forty-five minutes afterward.

It also caused an increase in the speed of his pulse up to 50 per cent and the same amount of increase in the rate of breathing or respiration, showing a stimulating effect on the heart.

When the smoker first drank two cups of coffee, about one pint, before smoking the cigarette, however, the unsteadiness of his hands showed very little increase while he was smoking and his steadiness went back practically to normal when the cigarette was finished.

A higher death rate for 1934 than either of the two previous years was forecast before the scientists. Although the death rate had been declining slightly for the four years, 1930 to 1933 inclusive, and not an undue number of people had died of starvation, disease or accident during the depression, hard times nevertheless had exacted their toll, said Miss Dorothy G. Wiehl and Dr. Edgar Sudenstricker of the Milbank Memorial Fund, New York.

Highest in Jobless Families

The death rate for families with no employed workers or with part-time workers increased 43 per cent in 1931-32, last years for which such figures are available, over the death rate in families with full-time workers.

A new Harvard survey showing the American criminal to be physically and mentally inferior was reported to the association recently.

The study suggested a biological attack on the crime problem. It was reported by Dr. Earnest A. Hooton, anthropologist, in the Sigma Xi lecture on the subject "Homo Sapiens, Whence and Whither?"

"In 1913," he said, "Charles Goring conclusively demonstrated that English criminals as a group are vastly inferior in physical development to the law abiding population.

"My own researches upon the American criminal in ten States are even more decisive. While the complete results cannot yet be divulged, it can be stated that the biological inferiority of the criminal is no less marked than his economic ineffectiveness and his general stupidity."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Simultaneous Whistling and Singing

Werner Heymann, European composer, now in Hollywood, started composing as a child prodigy in Germany. At the age of 10 he discovered he could whistle and sing at the same time. His musical training enables him either to whistle one song and sing the accompaniment or counterpoint, or do two different numbers at the same time. One of his most remarkable demonstrations of this unusual gift is the rendition of a Bach fugue, this number starts as a solo and after eight bars the second instrument comes in, starting at the beginning.

PRINCE AND PRINCESS HERE

Prince and Princess Orsini of Rome are guests at the Imperial hotel. They are visiting Japan on a pleasure trip around the world that began on November 26 when they sailed from Naples and will end when they return to Rome just before Easter Sunday.

Prince Orsini is prince assistant to the Holy See. Princess Arsini said she found Japan an enchanting land of beautiful landscapes and charming people. She has always thought of Japan in terms of progress and industry so she said she was not surprised at the strides made in sanitation and science, industry and education, which she noted here.

"It is very interesting what the people of Japan are doing in world affairs," she remarked.

Princess Orsini is straight and slim and softly spoken. Her long black bob is dressed away from her face and nicely waved in back. At the Imperial hotel this morning, she was the picture one always associated with princesses—she wore a long white satin robe with deep embroidery and gold colored sandals.

of these district courts."

However, it is understood that some officers in the department feel that laws to stiffen regulations of the fire-arms traffic and to require former convicts to register their movements would be of assistance.

Hoover Gives Statistics

Cold statistics were used by J. Edgar Hoover, director of the division of investigation, to recount in the Cummings report the grim combat with gangland.

For the year ended June 30, he reported eleven life sentences and other sentences aggregating 5,073 years.

Suspended sentences totalled 1,012 years and probationary sentences 2,501 years.

Fines imposed on Federal offenders added up to $772,938 and property recovered was valued at $1,116,619. The division located 928 fugitives.

A decrease in the number of persons under Federal supervision was noted by Sanford Bates, director of the prison bureau. In 1933 there were 55,060 persons under supervision; the 1934 figure is 42,122.

15,812 Prisoners in Year

The total Federal prisoners in penitentiaries, jails, reformatories, camps and hospitals was 15,812, as contrasted with 20,778 in 1933. The remainder under supervision had parole or probationary status.

Virtually all of the Assistant Attorneys General noted an increase in work during the fiscal year.

In January the tax division was organized and placed under Assistant Attorney General Frank J. Wideman. The division considered 4,739 cases.

The ledger showed that the department handled 126,314 cases and collected a total of $10,247,464 from fines, fees and the sale of prison-made goods. Expenditures were $31,184,213.

Tribe In Africa 'Wisecracks' In American Style

British Expedition Discovers Asumbos Gifted With Keen Sense Of Humor

The "wisecrack," quick-fire species of repartee, is not a phenomenon of purely American origin as many have supposed—it has been developed to a high degree by a little-known African tribe called the Asumbos.

This was one of the revelations made by Mr. Ivan Sanderson when he recently told the Royal Geographical Society in London about the discoveries of the Percy Sladen Zoological Expedition to the British Cameroons.

An account of Mr. Sanderson's address in the Christian Science Monitor is as follows:

The expedition was organized to make the first complete survey of the flora and fauna of the West African forest area. But besides bringing back several thousand specimens of mammals, insects and plants—including many live specimens of the rare Podogona insect—the expedition had time to make researches into the lives and culture of the native tribes.

Keen Sense of Humor

Mr. Sanderson declared himself to have been chiefly impressed by the efficient organization of some of the tribes and the very quick sense of humor of the Asumbos and the Baiangis.

"I feel safe in saying," Mr. Sanderson declared, "that these people have a keener sense of humor than our own. In fact, their outlook is decidedly that of the American "wisecracker" order, well shown by the man who offered us a baby common bush cat for 779 shillings, and then had to be carried out of camp because he was laughing so much at our counter offer—the sum in pennies, provided he would carry them away singlehanded and in one load."

The leaders of the expedition found that with some of their porters there was only one method of keeping discipline. That was to put any offender at the head of the file, without any burden. In such a position he was immediately inundated with a deluge of satire and jests from the rest of the porters.

"De Light Went Out"

Once the camp was overwhelmed by a sudden tornado. Mr. Sanderson called for help from the boys. None came. He went out into the driving rain and shined his torch upon their hut. It was no longer there. In the bushes a little way away a green mass heaved, and an occasional leg appeared. He ran down and extricated the head boy.

The boy looked at him and said solemnly: "Master, de light went out."

Nevertheless, these porters made expert collectors. They were very proud of their catches, and fought for the possession of the smallest insects.

One of them had so keen an eye that on one occasion he caught nearly 100 Podogona alive, although they only measure six millimeters about one-fourth inch, in length.

The native collectors had an astonishing keenness and thoroughness. Once they were told to dig a clearing two feet deep, so that underground snakes could be observed. Mr. Sanderson went back to the camp on business, and forgot about them. He was suddenly disturbed by a noise behind the camp. The boys had dug their way home, leaving behind them a path 20 feet wide, two feet deep and a quarter of a mile long.

But one of the most astonishing sights, in the expedition's view, was the court of Chief Ekumaw, ruler of four tribes. No white man, it is claimed, has ever been resident at Ekumaw's Court. But the chief is president of a parliament in which he enforces strict rules of debate.

The subchiefs are all proud orators. They present their arguments without interruption and give absolute abidance to Ekumaw's summing up. They have also kept a lengthy verbal history of their peoples.

The explorers later found a veritable wonderland of strange creatures and strange happenings.

One of the tables in the camp sprouted vegetation. The explorers also found it true that telegraph poles grow so quickly the wires are often carried out of reach of the treetops.

The expedition also found frogs with eyebrows, frogs that whistled, frogs that ticked like clocks, and frogs that changed their spots from black to silver when breathed upon.

Anti-Semitic Wave Stirs South Africa

Government Considers Ban On Racial Propaganda As Foe To Liberty

Anti-Semitic sentiment in South Africa is causing the Government to consider action to prohibit racial propaganda.

Referring to the emergence in South Africa of an "evil growth of intolerance and racial ill-will," Jan H. Hofmeyr, Minister of the Interior, in a speech to the university at Johannesburg indorsed and emphasized the appeal made by Gen. Jan C. Smuts some months ago to check this new growth, says the Christian Science Monitor.

"Within the last two years," he said, "there has been imported into South Africa anti-Semitism as an active propagandist creed. It is something alien to the best traditions of both British and Dutch in South Africa. We are liberty-loving people and hitherto we have accepted tolerance as an essential element of freedom.

"But in the last year things have been happening in South Africa which are in direct conflict with all that—and if no check is imposed, a grave blot must inevitably attach itself to our national character. There has been an open, organized attempt to stimulate race hatred against a section of the South African nation. To that end public meetings have been held and publications issued, some of them appealing to the least worthy instincts of humanity.

"The attempt has been made to incite racial animosity and religious intolerance, and tendencies have been set in motion which can only tend towards social disruption. We are already plucking some of the bitter fruits."

Mr. Hofmeyr said that despite appeals for tolerance from General Smuts the movement had continued and a position had been produced that was causing the Government serious concern.

Geneva Had Hard Time In 1934

with matters relating to the popular vote. Germany and France, as parties interested in the plebiscite, entered into an undertaking, under the auspices of the Council, not to discriminate against inhabitants of the territory on political grounds connected with the purpose of the plebiscite. Later, in December, the League of Nations took note of certain technical agreements between Germany and France relating to the disposal of the Saar mines; the Council also declared what the situation of the Territory would legally be if at the plebiscite the vote went in favor of the status quo.

To maintain order in the Territory before, during and after the plebiscite, an international force of troops from the United Kingdom, Italy, the Netherlands and Sweden, was set up under the authority of the Governing Commission.

Hungary vs. Yugoslavia

On two occasions a dispute has arisen between Hungary and Yugoslavia. In the spring, at Hungary's request, the Council dealt with incidents that had occurred on the Hungary-Yugoslav frontier. In December last it examined the complaint made by Yugoslavia, supported by the two other States of the Little Entente, denouncing the responsibility of the Hungarian authorities in the terrorist activity which led, on October 9, to the assassination of King Alexander the 1st and Monsieur Louis Barthou in Marseilles. The Council, after expressing its indignation at the crime, and declaring that every State had the duty to neglect no step in repressing terrorist activity, declared that, after the discussion that had taken place before it, certain Hungarian authorities might have assumed, at any rate through negligence, certain responsibilities relevant to acts having a connection with the preparation of the Marseilles crime, and announced that it was incumbent on Hungary to take appropriate punitive action in the case of any of its authorities whose culpability might be established; the Council being convinced of the good will of the Hungarian Government to perform its duty, requested it to communicate to the Council the measures it might take to that effect.

The Council also decided to set up a committee of experts to study the question of the repression of terrorism, with a view to the drafting of an international convention.

Finnish Govt. Claim

The Council again had before it the Finnish Government's claim against the United Kingdom in connection with vessels used by the British authorities during the war, and also an application from the Swiss Confederation in regard to reparation for damage sustained by its nationals on the territory of certain Powers, Germany, the United Kingdom, France and Italy, during the war. The question of the Council's jurisdiction was raised in regard to each of these matters.

The Advisory Committee of the 1933 Assembly laid down the measures to be taken, in particular as regards postal transit, in application of the resolution relating to the non-recognition of Manchoukuo.

A Committee of the Council has been endeavouring to establish those Assyrians which desired to leave Iraq, outside that country. After an investigation in Brazil, the Committee has been considering the settlement of these Assyrians in British Guiana.

III. Disarmament

The negotiations that began at the end of 1933 between the principal Powers concerned in the question of disarmament, Germany, the United Kingdom, France and Italy, were continued during the first four months of 1934, without an agreement being reached.

In view of this situation, the General Commission of the Conference, on June 8th, adopted a program of work including, inter alia, the following points:

Security (regional agreements and guarantees of execution of a Convention); air questions, manufacture of and trade in arms. The Commission instructed the Bureau to try to reach a solution of the problems remaining in suspense, without prejudice to private conversations that may be proceeding between governments.

In accordance with this decision, various technical Committees proceeded to make investigations. But in November the general situation had not changed and the Bureau decided to limit its work to three problems: the establishment of the Permanent Disarmament Commission, the supervision of the manufacture of and trade in arms, and the organization of a system of budgetary publicity. It was agreed that, without abandoning the completion of a general convention on the limitation and reduction of armaments, the agreements reached on the above three points should be immediately submitted in a single document for signature by Governments.

IV. Minorities

The generalisation of the system of minorities protection, which was raised by the Polish delegation, led to a long debate in the Assembly. Certain delegations approved in principle the idea of a generalisation limited to Europe, while others were opposed to this.

During the discussion, the Polish representative declared that, until such time as the protection of minorities should be made general, his Government would be obliged to refuse to co-operate with international bodies in regard to the supervision of Poland's application of the system of minorities' protection. The United Kingdom, French and Italian delegations recalled in this connection the fact that no state could, by unilateral action, free itself from obligations such as Poland had entered into in regard to minorities.

V. Administrative Questions

At its two sessions the Permanent Mandates Commission reviewed the administration of the mandated territories during the year 1933. In most of these territories the economic depression had caused serious financial, economic and social difficulties to the mandatory Powers.

As regards the Saar Territory, the preparation of the plebiscite required considerable attention by the Council (see Political Activity).

With reference to the Free City of Danzig, the Council reaffirmed the principles derived from Article 105 of the Versailles Treaty to the effect that the Free City's constitution is placed under the guarantee of the League. The Council repeated that the constitution could only be modified with the approval of the League and that the constitutional life of the Free City must, at all times, conform to the provisions of the constitution.

It was also emphasised that, without having to take up every question that might arise as regards the application of the constitution, the Council must alone judge of the occasions when it would intervene.

Daniel O'Connell

The great Irish Liberator and patriot (1775-1847) was elected to the English Parliament from Country Clare in 1828 to test the law under which a Catholic could not become a Member without taking an oath contrary to his conscience. It was due to O'Connell's action that this law was repealed. He sat in Parliament until his death in 1847.

The great veneration in which O'Connell was held by the Irish people is, reflected in his children. Of his 4 sons, Maurice was elected an M.P. for Tralee, Morgan for Meath, John for Athlone and Daniel, Jr. for Tralee.

Of his 3 daughters, Ellen married Christopher Fizsimon, M.P. for Dublin, Catherine married Chas. O'Connell, who represented Kerry and Elizabeth married Nicholas French who represented Dublin.

"To Dress Properly Is To Be Proper"

DISTINCTION

Only the well dressed man knows that distinction is acquired by careful chosing of materials and expert workmanship. He also knows that character in his clothes can be obtained only after painstaking study of his own personality. Quality clothes are not cheap clothes.

Economically, cheap clothes are expensive clothes. They look cheap; they do not hold their shape; and they do not wear well.

Garments that are made by machine or cheap tailoring systems, leave no room for the master craftsman to add that refined finish of completeness which denotes correct dress.

Those willing to meet reasonable charges for expert work on fine materials can obtain them

Britain Acting For Settlement Of Ualual Dispute

Italian Premier And Ruler Of Ethiopia Request British Mediation

At the request of Premier Benito Mussolini the British Government is "using its good offices" at Addis Ababa with a view to settlement of the Ualual dispute, according to the Christian Science Monitor's correspondent at London, whose account follows:

With full approval of Emperor Haile Selassie, Britain is also acting similarly in Rome.

An appeal to the League by the Ethiopian Government seemed probable in spite of Britain's efforts to bridge over the differences.

While the prospects are still none too rosy, it is hoped here that it will soon be possible to proceed to frontier demarcation as a means of preventing similar incidents in future.

While authoritative maps show Ualual far within Ethopian territory it is recognized in Downing Street that part at least of the blame for the Ualual clash is due to the fact that Ethiopia formerly raised difficulties about delimiting the frontier in accordance with the treaty of 1908. The Italo-Ethiopian boundary Commission which started work in 1910 had to return with its task unfinished, owing to the attitude of the Ethiopian Government.

Coincidence

Tribute is also being paid here to the correctness of Ethiopia's attitude in the dispute as set forth in its latest note to the League on Jan. 1 wherein is an offer to make full reparation to Italy if the investigation shows the Italian claim to the district to be justified.

It was to the relief of many European statesmen, that immemorial grazing rights of nomad Somalis, have indirectly involved the British Government in the dispute between Italy and Ethiopia over the wells of Ualual where on Dec. 5, a frontier affray occurred which, though apparently of purely local importance, has threatened to destroy the growing foundations of European peace.

Nomads in search of pasture have no use for frontiers and frontier makers generally have little use for nomads. This time, however, the wandering tribesmen have helped in the solution of a frontier problem instead of merely constituting that problem. But for the fact that shepherds from British Somaliland habitually feed their flocks in the district where the Italo-Ethiopian clash took place, Great Britain would not have been in a position to use its influence to prevent the dispute from having very serious repercussions.

Three great European powers—Britain, France and Italy—surround Ethiopia. For many years they have mostly eyed one another with suspicion, particularly France and Italy, French concessions to Italy in regard to Ethiopia were among the matters discussed between French Foreign Minister Pierre Laval and Undersecretary Fulvio Suvich of Italy just at the very moment of the Ualual incident.

Setback

There was, in fact, a definite setback in the negotiations for a Franco-Italian rapprochement upon which hung not merely the mutual relationships of these two countries, but the prospect of reconciling Italy and Yugoslavia, Italy and the Little Entente and even the settlement of the vexed question of Austria.

Thus it was that there was a general feeling of relief that Great Britain, fresh from the triumphs of the new nonisolationist policy which brought about the settlement of the Saar problem and the Yugoslav-Hungarian quarrel, had a direct interest in the Italo-Ethiopian dispute thanks to the nomadic habits of the unwitting tribesmen of British Somaliland.

At the very time of the clash a joint Anglo-Ethiopian commission was delving into the question of these nomadic rights with the full approval of the Italian Government. When the Commission got to Ualual, however, it found an Italian garrison there and the commander, who had not been warned of the Commission's impending arrival, refused to let it carry on its work. The Commission therefore withdrew, after registering an official protest.

Who Started Fight?

Encamped not far away from the wells at this time was a considerable force of local Ethiopian levies. It was between these and the Italian troops—also natives—that the fighting is understood to have occurred. Each side accuses the other of being the aggressor. Both agree that the Ethiopians drove the Italians back, only to be defeated in their turn by reinforcements including airplanes, which, according to the Ethiopian account, then proceeded to bomb unprotected towns and villages many miles beyond the frontier.

In attempting the task of peacemaker behind the scenes, the British were faced with the difficulty that the Italians appeared unable to recognize any possibility of the frontier being anywhere but where they claimed it to be, although the actual boundary has never been delimited. They demanded not only an apology but an indemnity and a full acknowledgement of turpitude from the Ethiopian Government. They would have nothing to do with the proposal for arbitration put forward by the Ethiopians in conformity with the treaty of August, 1928, which provides for arbitration or conciliation if any dispute of any kind should arise between them.

Frontier "Defined"

Great Britain urged the immediate demarcation of the Italo-Ethiopian frontier as a first step towards a settlement. The Ethiopians claim that Ualual is 60 miles their side of the boundary. The Italians say they have been in occupation of Ualual for years and that in spite of frequent requests on their part the Ethiopian Government has steadfastly refused to delimit the frontier in accordance with the treaty of 1908.

It is pointed out in London, however, that all authoritative maps show Ualual district as belonging to Ethiopia. Moreover, even though the actual frontier is not yet delimited it has been closely defined.

Emperor Menelik, himself, it is stated, drew the frontier line on the map and handed it to the Italian representative with the words: "Praise be God. The frontier question now is settled. It need never be reopened."

In these circumstances it is asked why, if the Italian case is so indisputably water-tight, there should be such reluctance on the part of Rome to having a neutral body confirm the Italian title to the district in question.

New Trade Pact Made By London And Free State

Dublin To Buy All Her Coal From Britain In Return For Added Cattle Sales

After two and a half years of economic warfare between Great Britain and the Irish Free State, the ice has finally been broken by a limited trade agreement involving concessions on each side, according to the New York Times

J. H. Thomas, Dominions Secretary, announced officially on January 3. "an informal understanding," whereby the Free State will buy all its coal in the United Kingdom, and Great Britain will enlarge her quota on the importation of Irish cattle. The agreement will mean an increase of 1,250,000 tons per year in British coal exports and will give steady employment to 5,000 miners.

Pact Will Hurt German Trade

Indicidentally, it will destroy one of Germany's few export markets (a) the very moment when the return of the Saar mines makes an increase in Germany's coal exports imperative. In the past two years the Free State has been satisfying a large part of its coal requirements from Germany.

Contrary to earlier reports, there is to be no relaxation in the special British duties imposed on Irish goods because of the annuities dispute. The quota on Irish cattle is simply widened from 50 per cent of the 1933 figure to 66 2-3 per cent in the case of fat cattle and to a figure approximating the 1930-32 average in the case of other classes.

Britain has, therefore, scored a double triumph, for not only will there be a larger market for British coal but larger revenues from increased imports of Irish cattle.

Official circles here deny any further move is imminent toward ending the Anglo-Irish tariff war. Nevertheless the new "understanding" is interpreted everywhere as the first stage of the ending of the conflict, which has cost each country heavily and has embittered relations between them ever since the Summer of 1922.

Dublin Gives the Terms

The completion of a trade agreement between the governments of the Irish Free State and Great Britain was officially confirmed in Dublin in the following communique issued by the Government Information Bureau:

"As a result of discussions between the governments of the Irish Free State and Great Britain, the quotas for cattle in 1935 will be increased in all categories by 33 1-3 per cent over the quotas in 1934 in return for increased purchases by the Free State of coal to an equivalent value."

The news of the agreement with the British has been received in Dublin and throughout the country with much satisfaction. Hope is generally expressed that this gesture between both countries at the outset of the new year may be a forerunner of still more cordial relations and, perhaps, an amicable settlement of outstanding political differences before the close of 1935.

The Free State's cattle trade is at present in sore straits and will benefit much from the agreement, while Britain will regain her entire coal trade here to the exclusion of Germany nad Poland, from which supplies have been imported in the past two years. The agreement will mean an interchange in trade to the value of about £1,000,000 ($4,930,000 at yesterday's exchange rate).

Eamon de Valera, President of the Free State Executive Council, when asked tonight if the conclusion of the agreement was a step toward settlement of wider issues between the two countries, replied that the agreement was complete in itself. It is a business arrangement, the President added, and the sort of agreement the Free State Government has always been willing to make with the British oGvernment.

Since President de Valera imposed a quota on coal imports aimed chiefly against British coal, British colliery owners, who had already suffered heavily as a result of Free State restrictions, had been making representations to their own government urging some agreement with the Free State.

The fact that the Free State was discussing a large coal quota for Germany with a German delegation doubtless also hastened action on the British side.

During the past two years of trade war the Free State has suffered most in loss of sales of cattle to Britain, while Britain's losses have been heaviest in the reduction of her coal exports to the Free State.

In 1931 Britain sold almost 2,500,000 tons of coal to the Free State. Last year the Free State bought fewer than 1,000,000 tons. On the other hand, the Free State sold almost 800,000 head of cattle to Britain in 1931, against fewer than 400,000 last year.

Asks New Imperial Parley

Temporarily falling in line with British suggestions of restricted exports, the Australian Government moved in January 3 for a new imperial economic conference similar to that held at Ottawa in 1932.

The government finally cabled to the British Government its consent to voluntary restriction of all her meat exports, including chilled beef, to Britain for the next three months. The consent is conditional on Britain's agreeing to discuss the larger issue of permanent meat imports and imperial trade generally at a conference.

When and if this conference which need not be so large as the Ottawa gathering, is held, Australia is expected to urge abolition of the quota system for imports and substitution of straight tariff preferences for foreign goods.

The Biblical Egg

The Biblical Egg laid by a Buff Orpington hen at the Castle Hill Mission, New Castle, Pa., would seem to lend the Latin "ab ovo" (from the egg), a new meaning. After the egg was laid it was found to bear the inscription "666 Rev. 13:18 14:9-10. The Bible passages (Revelation) so indicated really exist, and have been the subject of a sermon by the Rev. Lorenz Schmidt, superintendent of the Mission. It is even more startling that the initial figure 666 is the number of the Beast mentioned in the first passage.

RESIDENTS OF CHINA TO SEE JAPAN'S BLOSSOMS

Many residents of China are to see Japan's lovely cherry blossoms and are to enjoy the beautiful festivals that are held in connection with the blossoming of the cherry trees this spring.

The Japanese Government Railways in co-operation with the N.Y.K., O.S.K. and other steamship lines, have arranged a special excursion to enable residents of China to visit this country when the cherry trees are in bloom. There are alternative tours of 13 and 17 days each, at an inclusive cost of $235 and $275, respectively. The tours are as follows:

Starting from Shanghai on April 7 by the Nagasaki Maru, Nagasaki will be reached soon after noon on Monday. The next morning the party will be taken by motor cars to Unzen, via Obama, where a six-hour stop will enable visitors to explore its beauty spots and to inspect the famous hot springs. They will leave in the afternoon for Shimabara, on the coast, where the night will be spent.

Starting with a steamer trip in the morning from Shimabara across the Bay of Ariake to Misumi, the next two days include visits to Kumamoto, Tochinoki Hot Springs, Bochu (from whence an excursion will be made to the summit of Mt. Aso, an active volcano) and Beppu. This brings us to April 12, when the party will embark from Beppu in the evening for Osaka, cruising through the beautiful Inland Sea.

From Osaka, Kyoto is the next stop, reached on the afternoon of the 13th. This is one of the famous cherry blossom districts, and the itinerary includes a 3-hour sightseeing tour with visits to the Imperial Palace Grounds, Maruyama Park, and the temples. The next morning the party will take an express train for Nara, famous for its park and shrines. Sightseeing in Nara will be done in rickshas, a mode of travel well in keeping with the peaceful surroundings of this beautiful place. A return is made on the same afternoon to Kyoto for dinner and later in the evening the sightseers entrain for Tokyo, via Yokohama. They will reach Yokohama in the morning of the 16th and leave in the early afternoon for Tokyo, which is three-quarters of an hour from Yokohama by train. The next day will be spent sightseeing in Tokyo, where the Imperial Palace, Hibiya Park, Meiji Shrine and Nijo Castle are a few of the famous sights in store.

On April 18 the party will leave Tokyo for Nikko, where a delightful drive is planned to Kegon Waterfall and Lake Chuzenji, with a stop for lunch at the Lakeside Hotel. They will leave Chuzenji after lunch and return to Nikko, visiting Toshogu Shrine and Iyemitsu Mausoleum on the way. From Nikko back to Tokyo, where the night and the whole of the next day will be spent, and when the visitors will be free to do as they please.

On the 20th they entrain for Kobe, reached in the late afternoon. The next morning will be at the visitors' disposal and they will embark at noon on the Asama Maru, due to arrive in Shanghai on the morning of the 23rd.

U.S. Tax Returns Increases Show Gain In Business

Report For Five Months Shows $68,977,503 Increase In Receipts On Incomes

With an increase of $68,977,503 in income tax receipst for the first five months of the fiscal year to Nov. 30, over the total for the same period in 1933, a report of the Internal Revenue Bureau on Dec. 19 gave evidence of a general advance of recovery throughout the U. S. Of the increased income taxes, $19,785,227 was from invididual incomes.

To lend strength to the evidences of reviving business nearly all of the purely luxury products showed marked increase in tax returns to the Treasury, according to the New York Times. These included such items as playing cards, toilet preparations, radios, mechanical refrigerators, sporting goods, chewing gum, theater, concert and cabaret admissions.

The report showed a total internal revenue of $1,203,694,905, an increase of $290,579,968 over the same period of 1933.

The income taxes were analyzed as follows:

Corporation taxes—$147,297,022, an increase of $49,192,276.

Individual taxes—$110,129,362, an increase of $19,785,227.

Tobacco taxes for the first five months of the year amounted to $193,858,496, an increase of $22,704,273. Cigarettes led this group with $161,716,890, a gain of $22,951,105. The manufactured tobacco tax was $23,467,795, a drop of $149,528. Cigar taxes of $5,500,042 showed an increase of $44,045. On snuff $2,809,619 was collected, a decline of $149,340.

Tobacco Products Withdrawn

As shown by the payment of tax, withdrawals of cigarettes in November totaled 9,727,429,603, an increase of 2,892,000,000. This was evidently in anticipation of the Christmas trade. Cigar withdrawals numbered 466,163,546, a gain of 51,000,000. Withdrawals of manufactured tobacco amounted to 24,643,494 pounds, a gain of 1,900,000 pounds.

The capital stock tax for the first amounted to $90,039,698, a gain of $10,867,014; the excess profits tax, $1680,662, a gain of $1,661,706; the estate tax, $48,872,363, a gain of five months of the 1935 fiscal year $13,852,976, and the gift tax, $286,601, a gain of $227,283.

Miscellaneous internal revenue taxes amounted to $722,826,677 for the months, an increase of $92,190,387 as compared with the same period last year.

Playing card production amounted to 4,665,289 packs, an increase of 1,300,000 packs.

A steady increase in the collection of taxes on distilled spirits and a more than corresponding drop in assessments on malt liquors such as beer and ale were disclosed in the report.

Spirits Tax Hits New High

Distilled spirits taxes reached a new high for the post-repeal period in November with $15,087,767, while beer taxes for that month were $14,910,445, the lowest since last April. The distilled spirits gain and the malt liqur drop were in a measure seasonal.

For the first five months of the fiscal year total liquor taxes amounted to $178,918,599, while for November the figure was $34,376,928, with the exception of September the lowest of the current fiscal year.

For the 1934 fiscal year and the first five months of the 1935 year total liquor tax collections amounted to $437,829,931. The bulk of this collection was for the period beginning Dec. 5, 1933, the date of repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment.

The specific principal collections for the July 1, 1933-Nov. 30, 1934, priod were as follows:

Source.	Amount
Malt Liquors	$260,722,700
Distilled spirits	119,337,330
Import excise tax ..	12,352,143

Other taxes making up the total were of minor nature, including rectification, wine, stamp, license and other levies.

Liquor tax collections have been substantially below estimates prepared when the bill was pending in Congress. The increase in the distilled spirits taxes, however, was regarded as an indication that eventually the estimates probably would be reached, with greater domestic production, improved quality and lower prices.

Debt Reaches $31,843,000,000

America's national debt burden advanced toward President Roosevelt's fiscal year-end estimate of $31,843,000,000, despite tax revenues larger than a year ago.

With five and a half months of the current fiscal year paid up, the public debt stands at $28,385,067,000 as compared with $23,827,041,000 a year ago. The deficit piled up since July 1 is $1,620,414,000, as against $917,435,000 in the same period last year.

Geneva Had Hard Time During 1934

League's work has chiefly been directed to the following points: desertion of the family, the welfare and education of blind children, educational films, institutions for delinquent and erring children, children in moral danger and the effects of the economic depression and unemployment upon children and young people.

XII. Refugees

In its work for refugees the Nansen International Office has been trying to limit the spread of the economic depression and to remedy the effects produced on refugees by the tries to prohibit the employment of foreign labor.

The Office estimates the number of Russian refugees at about 800,000, Armenians at 170,000 and Assyrians, Assyro-Chaldeans and Turks at 14,000: More than 26,000 Armenians in Syria have been evacuated from camps and settled in farm colonies or urban quarters. During the year the Office has given assistance to more than 90,000 refugees.

XIII. Technical Cooperation With With China

The technical co-operation between the League and China which began in 1929, has been actively pursued. The Intellectual Cooperation Organization has been helping in the establishment of employment exchanges for intellectual and technical workers which the Chinese Government has decided to set up at Nanking and in the West for the purpose of better adapting the technical training of Chinese students in Europe and the United States to the present requirements of economic reconstruction in China.

The Health Organization and its experts have helped in the development of the Central Field Health Station at Nanking in conformity with the plan drawn up in 1930, and in the health ad veterinary work recently undertaken in certain provinces of the interior.

The Communications and Transit Organization has directed its activities towards co-operation in the road and water conservancy work set on foot by the Chinese Economic Council. A group of experts appointed by the Organization is going shortly to China to deal with several problems of water conservancy and road communications.

Dr. Rajchman, the Techhnical Agent sent last year to China by the Council, has returned to Geneva and made a report on the League's technical co-operation with the Chinese Government: this co-operation has been effective and fruitful of results.

XIV. Budget of the League

The League's budget voted for 1935 is 30,639,664 gold francs, or 188,141 francs lower than for the previous year.

More than 88 per cent of contributions, current or in arrears, have been received up to date, as compared with 76 per cent last year.

20-Point Party Aim Is Outlined By Republican

Snell Favors Sound Money Policy Both In America And Abroad

Immediately upon the convening of the new U.S. Congress, Representative Snell of New York, Republican leader, laid down a twenty-point program upon which he said his party would cooperate for the restoration of prosperity.

Mr. Snell's program was presented to the nation over a network of the National Broadcasting Company. It contained proposals for balancing the budget, for a sound-money policy, permanent insurance of bank deposits, a protective tariff, strengthening of the anti-trust laws and for taking the profits of war and the government out of business.

Democratic House leaders were too busy organizing that body to reply in detail to Mr. Snell's program, but Senator Robinson, administration spokesman in the upper body, took advantage of the recess to criticize it.

Mr. Snell reminded his audience that while he spoke for a relatively few members of the House, he spoke for representatives of 46 per cent of the people who voted in the November election.

Twenty Points in Snell Program

The program announced by Mr. Snell, according to the New York Times, is as follows:

"1. We favor the restoration of the three coordinate and separate branches of the Federal Government—the legislative, the executive and the judicial.

"2. We stand for government by laws passed by the regular constituted body for that purpose, and oppose this extravagant, bureaucratic government of the present administration, which has already issued 10,000 executive orders that have the force of laws.

"3. We favor the immediate return of all the legitimate powers of the States to the States and the subdivisions thereof.

"4. We advocate an honest and speedy balancing of the Federal budget.

"5. We favor a sound and stable money policy, both at home and abroad.

"6. We favor permanent insurance of bank deposits.

"7. We stand for restoration of the merit system in government employment.

"8. We believe a protective tariff on all competitive products and strict enforcement of restricted immigration is essential to American labor.

"9. We are for abolishing all child labor and the sweatshop system of contract labor.

"10. We favor strengthening, not weakening, the anti-trust laws.

"11. We stand for honestly conducted private business and opposo the government entering the competitive field of private enterprise.

Low Rate Loans Urged

"12. We favor, as an emergency measure for the relief of the unemployed, liberal loans to private business at a low rate of interest as opposed to the many wasteful and extravagant expenditures now being made, and without the restrictive features now imposed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in making these loans.

"13. We favor a liberal policy toward veterans of all wars.

"14. We favor every effort to take profits out of war and to promote continued world peace.

"15. In time of war we favor the principle of the universal draft.

"16. We favor ample care of the needy, aged and unemployed, but maintained that the responsibility of administering this relief should be left with local communities.

"17. We favor the principle of job insurance, to be paid for by the employe, the employer and the State.

"18. We favor the principle of old age pensions and assert that both of these subjects are primarily State functions and obligations.

"19. We favor and will support all sound legislation to restore agricultural buying power and to enable the farmer to refinance himself in this period of depression, and further believe that the administration of agricultural legislation should be placed, as far as possible, in the hands of the farmers themselves rather than under a bureaucracy in Washington.

"20. We believe in freedom of speech and in freedom of the press, and in freedom of the radio for the discussion of national questions."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Strangest Ship Surgery

The "Milwaukee," a steamer of 7,317 tons was launched in 1897 for service between England and the United States. On one of these trips in 1899 she struck the dangerous cliffs of Port Erroll off Peterhead, Scotland. A piece of rock 30 feet long penetrated the hull, practically cutting the ship in half. The salvagers hurrying to the spot found that the machinery concentrated in the aft half of the ship had not been affected and decided to save it. They managed to float the ship into the harbor where they proceeded to provide it with a brand new bow. This curious operation was performed at the same shipyard where the "Milwaukee" had originally been built. The new bow was found to fit the amputated stern with marvelous accuracy, and the completed ship resumed service as good as, if not better than, new. The cost of the operation is said to have been very considerable.

The Hinge Tortoise

In Guinea and Gabun in tropical Africa lives a species of tortoises whose carapace is connected to the interior part by a hinge upon which it moves freely. The hinge permits a complete closeup of the shell whenever the animal decides to withdraw from sight.

Social and Personal Notes

MR. AMAU ENTERTAINS FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

Mr. Eiji Amau, the spokesman of the Foreign Office, was host on Saturday evening to some 40 resident foreign correspondents at the Maple Club in Shiba Park. This was by far the largest gathering of foreign newspapermen ever to assemble at one time at such a reception in this city.

As entertainers and to wait on the guests about 20 Shimabashi geisha had been called and delighted the guests with a number of typical Japanese dances and songs. Later in the evening they acted as dancing partners in the Western type of ballroom dancing on the matted floor of the spacious hall.

As is the custom at Japanese banquets, Mr. Amau delivered his "after dinner" speech before the dinner was served. His greeting, "Lady and Gentlemen," occasioned much laughter as all eyes turned to the only foreign woman present, Margit Gantenbein, correspondent of a number of Swiss newspapers.

Mr. Amau expressed gratification over the presence of so large a number of foreign writers. He recalled that the number of correspondents had increased tremendously since his first dinner soon after his appointment as spokesman of the Foreign Office. "There has," he declared, "been a big expansion in my business." He was happy also, he said, because this was one time when he would not have to answer a barrage of questions.

Mr. Hugh Byas of the London and New York Times responded for the guests. He preferred, he said, to liken Mr. Amau's press conferences not to a business meeting but to a church with the spokesman occupying the pulpit and the correspondents as converts. The ever-increasing number of "converts," said Mr. Byas is striking testimony of Mr. Amau's success.

Besides the foreign correspondents a large number of officials of the Information Bureau of the Foreign Office were present. The writers present included Mr. G. Alsot of Havas, Mr. Glenn Babb of the Associated Press, Mr. Donald Brown of the Japan Advertiser, Mr. Hugh Byas of the New York Times, Mr. A. R. Catto of the London Exchange Telegraph, Mr. R. D. de la Chevalerie, Mr. F. Chevalier of Le Temps, Mr. M. J. Cox of Reuters, Mr. Burton Crane of the Wall Street Journal, Mr. Newton Edgers of the Sun, London, Mr. J. Fabius of De Lokomotif, of the Dutch East Indies, Mr. Wilfrid Fleisher of the Japan Advertiser and the New York Herald-Tribune, Mr. V. L. Kudriavtzev of Tass, Mr. R. G. Marchell of the United Press, Mr. A Meus of Nemzeti Ujsag, Budapest, Mr. A. L. Naghi of Tass, Mr. Leslie Nakashima of the Japan Times, Mr. H. M. Noel of Petit Parisien, Mr. K. Sheba of the Japan Times and the Chicago Tribune, Mr. A. F. Thomas of the Morning Post, Mr. B. de Vukelic of Politika, Belgrade, Mr. H. von Waldheim of Eildienst fuer Aussenhandel, Berlin, Mr. Percy Whiteing of the London Daily Telegraph and the Australian Press, Margin Cantenbein of a number of Swiss newspapers, Mr. T. Sagara of Rengo, Mr. Hamano of Dentsu, Mr. Emile Masatomi of the Tokyo Nichi-Nichi and Osaka Mainichi and others.

LEAVING FOR EUROPE

Miss Milka Pringsheim and Master Klaus Pringsheim, children of Professor Klaus Pringsheim, director of the chorus and orchestra of the Tokyo Academy of Music, will sail from Kobe Wednesday on the N.Y.K. liner Hakozaki Maru for Europe.

Prof. Pringsheim entertained at a farewell party for them Friday evening. Among the guests were Viscount Konoe, Professor and Mrs. Leo Sirota, Professor Robert Pollak, Miss Sueko Ogura, Mr. Aage Henricksen, and Dr. Gabriele Formoso.

Miss Milka Pringsheim

Miss Pringsheim is an actress who has played leading parts in dramatic plays and musical comedies in Europe. She is a graduate of Max Reinhardt's Theater School of Berlin and following her graduation, she has made her appearances in Germany, Denmark, and Czechoslovakia where she has made her home for several years. Before returning to Prague, she will go to London to see that her little brother is again happily established in his boarding school.

PENWOMEN ORGANIZING LECTURE COMMITTEE

As a service to Tokyo's many clubs, the Tokyo Branch of the National League of American Penwomen is organizing a lecture committee which will supply speakers on various topics.

Plans for the new activity were made at the organization's monthly meeting Saturday afternoon in the Tokyo Science Museum following an inspection of the exhibits there.

Mrs. Edith de Garris is chairman of the committee, which will supply speakers to Japanese clubs, foreign organizations, or associations which embrace both groups. Members of the Tokyo Branch of the National League of American Penwomen who are authorities on various subjects, upon which they have individually written and studied, are to be available to organizations which need speakers. Clubs in Yokohama and Kobe may also call on the committee for speakers.

Mr. Kinjiro Mori, curator of the departments of education and physics and engineering of the musuem and a member of the director's staff of the museum, conducted the penwomen through the museum. The explanations which he added from his own personal knowledge of the exhibits, added much to the enjoyment of the afternoon. Following the inspection, Mr. Mori entertained the group at tea. Arrangements for the meeting were made by Mrs. J. S. Happer.

The afternoon's tour was crowded with the unusual. There was, for instance, fowls with long tails—12 to 14 feet in length, beautiful birds of paradise with many colored feathers, and a rare old clock of six faces that needed to be wound only every 400 days! The base of this clock, of lacquer and cloisonne, was of beautiful, intricate workmanship. In the Takabayashi clock room, the women saw 120 different clocks made by Japanese in the Tokugawa period. These included pyramid, stand, table, pillar, and wall clocks, sundials, and other very curious clocks of unusual workmanship. The collection is the result of more than 10 years efforts of Mr. Hyoe Takabayashi who lives in the outskirts of Hammamatsu, Shizuoka prefecture, and who contributed his entire collection to the museum when it was first opened to the public. The room in which the collection is held is known as the Takabayashi Clock room.

In the botanical department, the penwomen saw large pictures on the wall, representative of the typical aspects of the plant life during the four seasons in Japan. There were the cherry blossoms at Koganei in the spring, the alpine plants of summer, the chrysanthemums at the Imperial garden in autumn, and the snow view of Mayasushima in winter. On the opposite wall, they viewed great wonders of the world—the tropical growth of Victoria, the great forests of America, the gigantic grass of the African deserts, and the enormous banyan trees of India.

In the geological department were panoramic views of copper and coal mines included in the murals.

True-to-nature representations were admired in the zoology department where a forest scene showing the life the birds, animals and insects of Azumagun exhibited in their natural habitants.

ATTEND Y.C. & A.C. DANCE

About 100 persons attended the tea dance and motion picture program at the Y.C. & A.C. Sunday. The tea dance was held from 4 to 7 p.m. following which a double feature, "Wild Gold," and "She Learned About Sailors" was shown.

Richard Barthelmess plays the leading role in "Midnight Alibi" which will be shown with the "Return of the Terror" at the club Wednesday evening. The action of "Return of the Terror" in which Mary Astor is starred, was suggested by a mystery drama of the famous author, Edgar Wallace.

The story concerns a series of crimes, the first of which is the killing of a number of patients at a private sanitarium for which the superintendent is convicted and confined to an insane asylum.

Three other slayings and two attempted murders follow upon the escape of of the asylum inmate, all taking place on a single night of terror at the very sanitarium at which the patients had been slain.

The picture also carries a double romance, one of the love affair of the feminine owner of the sanitarium and the accused superintendent, and the other that of a reporter and a nurse in the institution. In addition there is said to be considerable comedy which comes in as a relief for the terrific tension caused by the harrowing situations.

US Balloon To Make Flight To Stratosphere

—U. S. Army Air Corps Flight of 1935, full advantage will be taken of the lessons learned during the previous flight.

"A continuation of the explorations in the high regions of the atmosphere is considered important and desirable to check and test data already obtained, to make additional photographic studies, to bring back samples of stratosphere air, and to make certain other new scientific studies. The expedition will place special emphasis on information that can be obtained only from a manned balloon capable of lifting standard laboratory instruments."

The flight of next summer will be made from the same place as that of 1934, a protected basin in the Black Rapid City, South Dakota. The equipment for the flight will be made available at an earlier date than last year, and it is hoped, it was said at National Geographic Society headquarters, that the ascent can be made during the first part of June.

Old Santiago To Be Reconstructed

Home Of Counts Of Reconquest Is Reproduced At Exposition Opening Soon

The Historical-Cultural Exposition, one of the largest ever organized in Chile, soon will open its doors and will continue until the end of April, according to the New York Herald Tribune. The exposition is a commercial venture, but has received official sanction from the Ministry of Finance.

A reconstruction of old Santiago of colonial days has been carried out. The ancient Casa Colorado, home of the Counts of Reconquest, is reproduced, with its bright red walls and cobbled courtyard.

The oldtime Spanish inns of the Corregidor and Santo Domingo are built just across the colonial city square, with its grass-grown flagstones and rumbling horse-drawn vehicles. The Sierrabella Arcade, long since absent from the center of the capital, is here reproduced.

Paraffin lamps illuminate this queer corner of ancient Santiago, resurrected for the curiosity of pleasure seekers at the fair, and oldtime watchmen in the garb of other centuries call out the hours.

Other gems from the past are the bedroom of La Quintrala, the Chilean woman whose history vies with the Borgias; the Chamber of the Royal Audience and a paved walk from the Tajamar, a defense work built by O'Higgins to safeguard the city from the encroaching River Mapocho.

Commercial firms have modern and striking stands, mostly in an ultra-modern note, typical of the World Fair at Chicago. A relief map of Chile, some 400 feet long, is housed in a special pavilion. A miniature "Conney Island" has been fitted up under the direction of Harry Witt, of Brooklyn, who brought the sideshows from the United States.

The exposition is being held in a portion of the grounds of the State Experimental Farm (Quinta Normal), a public park in the western part of the city.

New Attitude Of Calm Marks League Session

Powers' Turn To United Peace Effort From War Talk Heartens Statesmen

The present Council of the League of Nations marks the close of the most melancholy periods in post-war history. Europe is weary of the paralysis of cooperative effort which come with the withdrawal of Japan and Germany from the League, and the assumption by diplomats that war had become inevitable, says John T. Whitaker in a despatch from Geneva to the New York Herald Tribune dated Jan. 12. Foreign offices have taken courage again, and with "security through a strong league" as the watchword, Europe is putting its house in order.

A new period of cooperation, ushered in with the present League session, finds Germany, with the Lausanne agreement on preparations, her own rearmament, and the coming Saar plebiscite, virtually free of the Versailles Treaty. The security of France, on the other hand, is strengthened by the Balkan Entente, her Little Entente allies, her own agreement wih Moscow, and her recent accord with Rome—a formidable network anchored at Genevea, where Great Britain is cooperating again.

Franco-German Threat

When they are equally powerful Germany and France, having only rivalry between them, would constitute a constant threat to peace, and this is the decisive point stressed by the diplomats assembled here now. The security system is being built up for the moment when Germany, with her troublesome inferiorty complex, achieves "equality" so that future Franco-German relations can be decided by negotiation and not force of arms.

Japan has an inferiority complex equally troublesome to peace, and in the face of her denunciation of the Washington treaties and the assumption of control over China, the United States is building a strong navy. The European status quo powers are not rich enough in man power or gold to make comparable increase in their armaments. Since the French general staff decided some two years ago that a preventive war was impossble, ther solution has become an organization of peace.

France Puts It up to Britain

France made a decisive step April 17 1934 when she dispatched a note rejecting the Anglo-Itaiian disarmahent proposals. France said bluntly that, in the face of German rearmament, she could not carry on disarmament negotiations unless Britain guaranteed her security. Britain, of course, had no such intention.

Going on lone-handed, France reached an agreement with Russia, whose fear of Germany and Japan had brought around to the status quo. Russia pressed Turkey into a Balkan Entente, the first multilateral agreement of the status quo powers which provided mutual military aid. Britain was slowly dislodged from her concept of a balance of power, as opposed to the Geneva theory of security, by the specters of a Franco-Russian alliance against German and a Balkan alliance against Italy. Her opposition to a pact of mutual assistance and the Russian entry into the League changed to benevolent sponsorship.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Sign Addressed To God

In 1660 Francis, an ascetic of Paris, died of voluntary starvation and his grave at the St. Medard cemetery in Paris became a place of pilgrimage where miracles were believed to have happened. The French King ordered the cemetery closed to prevent disorders. Some unknown then placed a sign in the cemetery, to the effect that "in the name of the King the good God is forbidden to work miracles here."

The Visible God

Ranavalona III (1862-1922) succeeded to the throne of Madagascar in 1883. She adopted Christianity and joined the Anglican Church. In spite of this the people of Madagascar continued to regard her as a "visible God" which was the age old attribute of their rulers. She was the owner of all the land in the great island, all crops, produce, inventions and houses. To distinguish her from her subjects the Queen spoke a divine language, her exclusive privilege which was forbidden to any mortal under pain of death. Her title was "andriamanitra" (literally "the perfumed god") and the language which she alone was entitled to speak was "voula fall" (sacred words). Due to her revolt against the French rule, Ranavalona lost her throne in 1896 and died in exile in Algeria in 1922.

Colgate Conquers Army Sextet, 2-0

Abercrombie Registers Both Goals In Second Period Of Game At West Point

N. Y. Times

WEST POINT, N.Y., Jan. 5—Colgate subdued Army at hockey tonight, 2 to 0, in the opening game of the season for the cadets. The contest was played in the West Point Arena on fast ice. The Red Raiders outskated the cadets and were proved the better stick handlers.

Billings, the visiting goalie, starred throughout, turning back many Army advances, while Abercrombie was outstanding on the offense, his speed and accurate shooting accounting for both of Colgate's goals.

The Colgate counters came in the early minutes of the second period after a heavy attack had carried the puck on both occasions within close range of the home sextet's net. Although, Army fought hard, the up-Staters' stout defense was too strong. Barko in the Army cage played well for the cadets, as did Donohue and Grohs.

Van Bencoten Penalized

The work of both teams was ragged at the start, but there was plenty of action as play progressed. During the last five minutes of the first period Van Bencoten went into the penalty box for checking. The Army attack quickened then and the Cadets swarmed around Billings, the Colgate goalie.

The visitors' last line of defense was too strong, however, hard shots off the sticks of Donohue and Holterman being turned back in a magnificent stand. During a Colgate rally near the close of the session Sawyer successfully beat off Abercrombie's attack.

The speedy left wing of the Colgate sextet came back to harrass Sawyer early in the second stanza with repeated shots and he finally scored on a quick pass from Rlyea from in front of Army's cage in 2:20. Abercrombie counted again at 4:30, Van Bencoten handing him the puck on a pretty relay. Sawyer was relieved at this point, Barko going into the Cadet's net.

Colgate Continues Drive

Colgate bombarded the new Army man with a swift attack but he beat them with several sensational saves. Relyea got rough and was penalized. Army again attacked savagely at this point but Billings's marvelous stops halted the Cadets and the period closed with no further scoring.

MEMORIAL TO JUDGE PAYNE

The voice of the late Judge John Barton Payne, chairman of the American Red Cross and chairman of the Board of Governors of the League of Red Cross Societies, was heard again following tributes to his noble character paid by leading residents of Japan Monday afternoon at a memorial meeting in the Japan Red Cross headquarters, Shiba park.

When the late Judge Payne broadcast to America at the time of the International Red Cross conference in Tokyo last October, his address was recorded as he spoke into the microphone. At the memorial meeting Monday, that address was again delivered through a loud speaker which had been stationed behind white drapes on the platform thus and the voice of the late leader was again heard by the 200 friends who had gathered to pay him honor.

Tributes to the late leader were given by Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, President of the Red Cross Society of Japan; Mr. Joseph C. Grew, the American Ambassador; Mr. Torataro Ushizuka, Mayor of Tokyo; Mr. Koki Hirota, the Foreign Minister, whose message was ready by Mr. Kensuke Horinouchi, chief of the American Affairs Bureau of the Foreign Office; and Master Yoshiro Saito, sixth grade student at the Taimei Primary School and spokesman for the Junior Red Cross.

Among those at the meeting were Mr. Inagaki, personal representative of Prince Kotohito Kanin, Honorary President of the Japanese Red Cross; Mr. Shikama, personal representative of Prince Hiroyasu Fushimi; the German Ambassador and Mrs. von Dirksen; the Canadian Minister and Mrs. Herbert Marler; the Colombian Minister and Mrs. Domingo Esguerra; the Mexican Minister, Dr. Miguel Alonzo-Romero; the Argentine Charge d'Affaires, Mr. Arturo A. Montenegro; and other members of embassies and legations.

Prince Tokugawa recalled the work of Judge Payne, not only during the international conference in Tokyo, but also at the time of the great earthquake in Japan. Judge Payne at that time had charge of raising funds in America for relief work in Japan. He also told of Judge Payne's unrelenting efforts for humanity during the World War.

Ambassador Grew declared:

"Only three months ago, in an address delivered at the service held at St. Luke's International Medical Center in memory of the late Dr. Teusler, I had occasion to refer to the progressively influential part played in civilizing and uniting mankind by the two great fields of art and science, especially by the science of medicine, as levellers of international barriers, promoters of international agreement and understanding, and blenders of human relationships. One evening before the address was delivered the draft was shown to Judge Payne, who at that time was our guest at the Embassy, and his criticism was requested.

"He read the text without comment until he came to the passage just mentioned, and there he stopped and said (I remember his very words):

"True beyond peradventure, but to science and art you must add the humanities.

"How completely this remark epitomized Judge Payne's life and all he stood for! For in the field of the humanities lay his own great work and his great achievements. And since it was at Judge Payne's instance that the address at Dr. Teusler's memorial service was elaborated it seems now appropriate to repeat and to apply to his own work the same thought that was there set forth—that the spirit of the Good Samaritan is increasingly alive today, exerting its healing influence, rising above prejudice or partisanship or dogma; aiding, soothing, uniting in our strife-ridden world. To this high purpose Judge Payne devoted the final and the ripest years of his useful life.

"It was undoubtedly a profound satisfaction to Judge Payne that the climax of his eminent career should have been the great Red Cross Conference in Tokyo. He spoke often of his deep appreciation of the encient arrangements which had been made for the meeting and of the warm Japanese hospitality constantly accorded to the delegates. He regarded the conference as the most successful that has even been held. To Prince Tokugawa personally, and to the other officers of the Japanese Red Cross, he felt a sense of genuine gratitude for their effective co-operation and for all that was done to render thoroughly worth while not only the attendance of the large American delegation but the effort which he himself had made in undertaking the long journey. The fact that he did make this effort in spite of advanced age and indifferent health due to the effects of a most serious operation a few years ago showed how completely his interests and his life were bound up in the welfare of the Red Cross movement. His particular interest in Japan and his affection for the Japanese, among whom he was privileged to enjoy many warm friendships, arose especially from his co-operation after the great earthquake in endeavoring to relieve in some measure the widespread distress caused by that terrible catastrophe."

NEW BOOKS AT CLUB LIBRARY

The Tokyo Women's club has added 12 new books to its library at the Y.W.C.A., Mrs. Theodore Walser, librarian, announced at the meeting Monday. Among these are "Roman String," "Revolt of the Masses," "This Little World," "When Yellow Leaves," "Heaven is My Destination" by Thornton Wilder, and "A House Divided."

There will be no meeting of the club next Monday which is a national holiday and the library will not be open. On the following Monday, February 18, the library will be open from 1:30 to 2:30 p.m. preceding the meeting at the Mikimoto Jewelry store on the Ginza at 3 p.m. Books withdrawn at that time may be kept for two weeks as the library will not be open February 25. On that date, the club will tour the Columbia factory, meeting at 2:30 p.m. at the Kawasaki station.

Mr. Ernest Pickering gave a lesson in English literature at the club Monday. He lecture on the novelists, Frances Burney, Jane Austen, Charlotte Bronte, Mrs. Gaskill, and George Elliot. He showed how each had developed the heroine's character, discussed the qualities of each writer and read from works of several of the novelists. He believed that Jane Austen's heroine, "Elizabeth" was autobigraphical in character and ranked Jane Austen as one of the greatest writers.

Need For Hostels To Aid Probation Cited In Britain

Existing Institutions Are Inadequate, Penal Reform League Says

Shortage of hostels for young offenders under probation is hindering the working of the new Children and Young People's Act in Britain, according to the Howard League for Penal Reform, says an article in the Christian Science Monitor.

The act raised the age at which young people appear before juvenile courts from 16 to 17, but it did not stipulate for more hostels. As a result, the Howard League points out in the annual issue of its journal, accommodation has been severely strained and young people of ill-assorted character have been thrown together, doing one another a great deal more harm than good.

Homes for Girls

Before the act became a law, the Howard League pressed unsuccessfully for the shortening of the period for which children may be sent to Home Office schools. It asked that these shortened periods—they might last for six months—should be followed by periods spent in hostels where training could take the form of preparation for life and work in the ordinary outside world.

The league now presses for this again, since reformation, they say, can never be accomplished under conditions unadapted to reformation, and unfortuntae youthful contacts may swell rather than diminish the number of young people who retain criminal tendencies in later years.

Only four approved homes and one hostel exist in London for girls. There is no single maternity home for "care-and-protection" cases, and no way of obtaining grants for such cases except through the making of special arrangements with local authorities.

Wholesome Contacts

Here, again, the Howard League says, the introduction of short-term periods in Home Office schools, followed by periods spent in hostels among people of "imagination and a modern outlook," would be of immense advantage.

It is necessary, the league argues, to provide something more than severe institutional treatment for girls who have got into difficulties between the ages of 16 and 17. If this is not provided, two things are likely to happen.

In the first place, magistrates will be driven, against their better judgment, either to discharge cases or to use existing accommodation. In the second place, the act will fail in its object of helping young people at an early stage, because cases "will not be brought to juvenile courts unless the courts can satisfy those interested in the welfare of the young that they have reasonable facilities for dealing with them."

Vines Outplays Stoefen In Pittsburgh Tennis

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

PITTSBURGH, Jan. 12—It took Ellsworth Vines 1 hour and 45 minutes tonight to down Lester Stoefen in their professional tennis match at Pittsburgh's Duquesne Gardens.

The match scores, longest since the professionals started their tour, were 10-8, 6-8, 6-4. Four thousand persons watched the professionals.

George M. Lott jr., paired with Stoefen, defeated William Tilden and Vines in the doubles match, 1-6, 7-5, 6-3.

Lott and Stoefen started raggedly but regained their stride in the second set. They were down at 2-4 in the second set when Tilden's service was broken twice to win the set.

In the third set every player won his own service until the count reached 4-3 for Lott and Stoefen. Tilden's service again was broken and Stoefen won his own service at love and took the set and match.

Trinidad Seeks To Improve Lot Of Idle Workers

Commission Reports On Prolonged Drought Of Sugar Lands

The lot of the Trinidad laborer is to be improved, on proposal of a governmental commission, which has been investigating the recent disturbances in the sugar districts, says the Christian Science Monitor.

In common with other parts of the world, Trinidad has experienced a prolonged drought. According to the commission, this was the main cause of the disturbances. Because of the drought, the sugar plantations required fewer hands. Less rice and other local foodstuffs was grown, and this added still more to unemployment. The relief given apparently led to further discontent. The machinery for its administration was considered inadequate.

Provided the weather is normal, there should be no unemployment, the commission concluded. It points out, however, that any influx of workers may easily upset the normal equilibrium of supply and demand.

Unemployment Recorded

Chief among its recommendations is the suggestion that the Government should keep reliable unemployment records. These statistics should be supplied by the various district officers, who are in touch with the large employers of labor, the sugar and cocoa estates, and the oil companies.

The commission also has a word to say on the question of labor management on the estates. It suggests, for instance, that the chief officials of these estates should keep a closer check on the allocation of the daily tasks, the actual measuring of the work done and the booking of results. Another proposal is that workers should, whenever possible, be given part-time employment in times of drought or during a slump.

Meanwhile, an interesting social experiment is being tried on one of the sugar estates. The estate lays out a village with streets, drains and other necessities, and allows each laborer a plot of land on which to build a house. No ground rent is charged, and the estate pays all the rates and taxes.

These grants of land are usually reserved for workers who have lived for a considerable time in the estate barracks. The Government, too, is offering special facilities to laborers and peasant proprietors, who want to rent or to purchase small parcels of land on which to grow food crops for local consumption.

Many Races on Land

Many races till the ground in Trinidad. Nearly 42 per cent of all the cane produced is grown by 17,200 farmers, of whom two-thirds are East Indians and one-third West Indians. At the last census there were 33,312 natives of British India. Those born in Trinidad of British Indian parents or of East Indian origin numbered 114,271.

Last year the colony produced 120,763 tons of sugar. Four-fifths were exported, and fetched £1,115,-567. The largest factory, the Usine Ste. Madeleine, manufactured more than 46,000 tons. Altogether, 1,154,-261 tons of cane were ground, of which nearly 500,000 tons were purchased from cane farmers who received £300,000.

The factories received this supplies from three sources—the estates, farmers on estate lands and independent farmers on their own land. Holdings vary considerably from the "back garden patch" to about 50 acres. The largest company-owned estate extends to 26,000 acres. The avearge rent is £1 per acre a year.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

Palestine Day Finds Country Is Prospering

two are most significant at this stage.

The great increase in population has stimulated the building industry. In 1933 some £5,500,000 was invested in this field. Growth in home production of all agricultural and industrial products necessary for the local market took place. Market gardening and dairy produce, house furnishing, textiles and personal services greatly expanded. Increased demand for electricity and the greater use of the roads and the rail lines bear independent testimony to the growth of the home market. Oranges, wines and chemical products as well as service to tourists were the chief "exports."

Of course, as we should expect during this phase in the country's development, imports are much larger than exports. But this is a matter which will be corrected. Of more urgent consideration is the need for the government's preparedness with public works plans to offset any decline in private employment. Employment and prosperity are the result of the total demands of both private business and public authorities.

Linked With Other Lands

The future of Palestine depends also to a considerable extent on the development of her large hinterland. The opening of the Haifa harbor, the laying of the pipe line to Mosul, the projected road to Baghdad and the growth of civil aviation have now converted anticipation into reality. The economics of Palestine have become inextricably bound up with the economics of the Near East.

In the same way as the merchants of Antwerp, Rotterdam and Trieste could not restrict themselves to the trading needs of their own country, so the merchants of Haifa cannot limit their interests to the economic development of Palestine alone. The first task is to bring about closer economic union with Transjordania, now asking for capital and organizing ability and labor of the type that is lacking. The second is to facilitate trading arrangements with the rest of the hinterland, including Persia, Irak and Syria.

Ireland As Link For Anglo-Celtic League of Nations

'Pacificus' In Irish Times Would Also Invite U.S. To Join

A plan for an Anglo-Celtic League in which Ireland would act as a link to re-unite the British Commonwealth of Nations and the United States is being discussed in political crcles in Dublin.

The first step envisaged in the plan is to weld the sundered North and South Ireland into a federation in which both parts would have fiscal autonomy so that the North could retain its present system of free trade with Great Britain, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

With Ireland itself reunited, Irishmen overseas through their common tie with their motherland would, it is argued, serve to draw together not merely the present members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, but the United States with its 3,000,000 of Irish-born citizens. Thus, Ireland, instead of being a disruptive element in the relations of the English-speaking peoples of the world, would become a focal point in an Anglo-Celtic rapprochement leading to the establishment of world peace and prosperity.

Such is the scheme put forward in the Irish Times on New Year's Day by "Pacificus"—a nom-de-plume which conceals the identity of a "life-long Republican" writing in a traditionally "unionist" paper. Since the plan's appearance, it has been widely commented on by eminent men both in the North and South. In general, the view taken is that the theory is sound but that there are a good many practical difficulties in the way of its realization.

"Anglo-Celtic"

"Pacificus" prefaces his scheme with the statement that Eamon de Valera, President of the Irish Free State Executive Council, has twice spoken of a future British Commonwealth as a smaller League of Nations in which Ireland might be a member without diminution of her national status. "Pacificus" then observes that neither the Irish nor the Americans could consent to be in a "British" Commonwealth. So he revives the idea put forward by the novelist, Sir A. Conan Doyle—of Sherlock Holmes fame—who used to urge the claim of "Anglo-Celtic" as a substitute for "Anglo-Saxon."

The epithet "Anglo-Saxon," as "Pacificus" points out, "excludes the Scotch, Welsh and Irish; "British" excludes the Irish; but "Anglo-Celtic" is a term that embraces them all and describes as accurately as such terms can, the peoples of these islands and of the Dominions overseas and of the United States."

Mr. de Valera's conception cited by "Pacificus" of a future British Commonwealth is in actual fact identical with the view taken of the present British Commonwealth at the Imperial Conference of 1926 when defining the status of the members of the Commonwealth. The Conference including the Irish representatives (now in opposition at home) decided that the members are "autonomous communities within British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations."

They Decline

One of the Opposition members of the Dail pointed out in this connection during the debate on the Irish Nationality Bill just before Christmas that there is a wide difference between a British Commonwealth of Nations and a Commonwealth of British Nations. Irishmen he said could accept the former just as the people of South Africa had done—Dutch as well as British. Neither the Irish nor the South Africans, he added, could consent to belong to a Commonwealth of British Nations.

The chief difficulty foreseen by "Pacificus" in getting his plan adopted is the question of the Crown. But, he says, if an Irish Commonwealth of North and South is formed, it will have "the attributes of the Republic, though not the name." Let this Irish Commonwealth be formed, be urges, and "enter the Smaller League of Nations—along with the United States if possible."

"Pacificus" goes on: "The symbolic head of that League will be the British King. Pay him the compliments of friendship. He will have no constraint over you, will not limit your sovereignty nor veto your laws." If some people, "Pacificus" adds, like to "carry this voluntary respect farther, let them do so; how does it hurt you?"

Coal for Cattle

"Pacificus's" New Year proposal coincided within a day or two with the first betterment of Anglo-Irish relations since the de Valera Government took office in March, 1932. The "gentlemen's agreement" reached at the beginning of January, 1935, while only covering one item on each side—British coal and Irish cattle—is generally regarded as a stepping-stone to the gradual settlement of all the various political and economic questions in dispute between the two countries.

Behind the strictly Anglo-Irish questions, however, lies the still wider issue of Irish unity—the breaking down of the barrier between North and South. This is the one point on which all politicians in the South are united, though they are as the poles apart in their methods of achieving this result. "Pacificus" proposes in this connection the establishment of a joint council at a new capital; he suggests Tara as a place with a symbolic appeal to all Irishmen.

This Council, "Pacificus" says, should seek to assimilate the two civil services of North and South "beginning at once with police and post office" and then gradually "transferring to the Federal Senate all those concerns which are obviously matters of common interests."

Commenting on the "Pacificus" plan, the Irish Times says: 'It would be fatally easy to pick holes." But Ireland has "been squabbling too long about non-essentials." In stressing common interests instead of points of difference "Pacificus," at any rate is thinking in the right direction."

Greed Held Cause For Large Power Mergers In U.S.

Trade Board Tells Of Varied Securities Issued In Drive For Capital

The desire for commercial expansion, greed and personal ambition to become dominating factors in the industry "unquestionably" were major motives in development of large combinations of electric power utilities, the Federal Trade Commission told the United States Senate recently in another chapter of its report on its six-year investigation of the electric and gas companies, according to New York Times.

This had been demonstrated by its inquiry, the commission said, despite the fact that there existed also as one of the influences to such a trend efforts to reduce cost of generation and to take advantage of technical improvements, making practicable the transmission of electricity for long distances without excessive loss of energy.

The financial motive for such expansion, the commission said, was evident from an early stage of the electrical industry, the large amount of money required calling for great activity in getting capital interested.

"Securities to fit the ideas of all classes of investors were produced and marketed," the commission said. "Mortgage bonds on the plants and other fixed investment of operating companies were issued for the most conservative investors. Preferred stocks were not so highly valued.

Speculators Were Attracted

"The common stocks of holding companies which held the common stocks of operating companies were offered to the speculative buyer.

"Later even the common stocks of an apex company of a series of super-holding companies pyramided one upon another—the equities of equities—were able to find a wide demand.

"Such super-holding company stocks had a great attraction for the highly speculative or credulous investor and trader, because, as long as the industry continued to grow rapidly, they afforded the possibility (not always realized, of course) of enormous advances in value through the immense leverage afforded by the capital structure of the pyramided super-holding companies."

The commission's report included the activities in the electric energy field of eighteen super-holding companies, forty-two subholding companies and ninety-one operating companies. Its examination of the ninety-one operating companies, with combined capital assets of nearly $3,307,000,000, the report said, "discovered write-ups and other improperly capitalized items amounting to not less than $842,995,000."

"Capital Written Up 34.2 Percent

"In other words," it added, "the value of capital assets which, based upon cost, as near as it could be ascertained, was $2,463,898,267 was written up 34.2 per cent to $3,306,893,610."

Today's report does not go into alleged write-ups of holding companies, which will be treated fully in later chapters.

As to the growth of the utilities, the commission cited Census Bureau reports to show that the value of plants and equipment in the electric utility industry had increased from about $500,000,000 in 1902 to more than $12,500,000,000 in 1932, with the period of greatest development between 1922 and 1932.

In 1902 the industry generated 2,507,051,000 kilowatt hours of current, while in 1932 the total generated was 79,657,000 kilowatt hours.

In dealing with the gas industry, the commission put production in the natural gas field in 1906 at 388,843,000,000 cubic feet, valued at $46,874,000, and in 1932 at 1,555,990,000, cubic feet, with a value of $384,632,000.

In the manufactured gas industry production was 67,093,553,000 cubic feet in 1899, valued at $75,716,693; reached a peak of 459,717,416,000 cubic feet, valued at $512,652,595, in 1929, and diminished in 1931 to 397,696,693,000 cubic feet, valued at $467,751,449.

Cities Service Led in Income

Included in the report are tables showing the assets and income of the holding and operating companies. Assets of the eighteen super-holding companies as of their last year of examination by commission experts were $4,119,769,627; total income was $325,686,734, and net income, before Federal income taxes, was $228,425,771. In 1932 these companies generated 39,585,517,490 kilowatt hours of energy.

Leading in corporate assets was the Cities Service Company, with $658,118,651 and total income of $35,351,048 for 1930. The Associated Gas and Electric Company was next with assets of $641,820,041 and total income of $48,815,756.

The report said that, in the period from 1929 to 1932, more than 78 per cent of the electric energy industry was controlled by holding companies and about 75 per cent of this by sixteen large holding companies.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Monument to a Hound

"Bluecap" after whom the Bluecap Hotel in Cheshire County, England, was named, is held to have been the greatest fox-hound that ever breathed. He is said to have won fortune and fame for the Smith Barry family, old time Masters of the Cheshire hunt. He was so immeasurably faster than all other Cheshire foxhounds that a heavy drag had to be hung about his neck to handicap him. An obelisk was erected to his memory.

Actress Appears In Actors' Stronghold

The play opens in the home of a woman hair dresser in Kyoto. Umejima is seen as Isa a university student whose father dies and he is unable to continue his education, and is supported by the hair dresser. The other ends of the eternal triangle are the woman's daughter, Chizuko, acted by Miss Yukiko Tsukuba, and Oyuki in the service of the place. Miss Mizutani makes a thoroughly correct and picturesque heroine.

Oyuki and the student are secretly in love with each other and enjoy an outing on the hilltops near Heizan with the panorama of lake Biwa spread out below.

Before the student's patroness dies she makes him promise to marry her daughter. Oyuki sacrifices herself that they may wed. Isa of course misunderstands and harbors ill feelings against her. There is a characteristic cemetery scene in which Isa and his wife go to pay their respects before his father's tomb, and later Oyuki come with flowers. She meets Isa alone and there is a stormy scene. Isa in his anger kicks her, which unmanly attitude tolerated by the audience, but which would be hissed by the audience of an occidental theater.

Then Oyuki's baby is born and, misery heaped upon misery, she is obliged to give the infant up to the wife.

However, Oyuki wins success in life, remaining true to her first love. She opens a beauty parlor in the Marunouchi Building in Tokyo with a waiting room that would do justice to the Tokyo Club. Here she meets Isa again, and they return to the love of the old days, but their relationship is a hindrance to him, and again Oyuki becomes a willing sacrifice.

Claims Of Bolivia And Paraguay Irreconsidable

Lorraine in the heart of South America, but it seems almost inevitable. It could be avoided if the neighboring countries, Brazil, Argentina, Chile, and Peru, would give suitable guarantees, but those countries have diverging interest, some in Paraguay, others in Bolivia, and an agreement between them would be difficult to reach. Another solution which was recently suggested was the creation of a buffer State between Paraguay and Bolivia. It is known that Santa Cruz, Bolivia's southernmost province, is dissatisfied, and would gladly set herself up as an independent State. Senor Ayala, the President of Paraguay, told me that the prisoners from that province had asked to be allowed to fight agaist the Bolivians, a suggestion which he very properly refused to consider. That solution, however, is not acceptable to Paraguay, who wishes to see the Bolivian boundary fixed so far from Asuncion that Bolivia will not be tempted to renew the war. Paraguay probably realizes that this ambition will never be achieved by means of arbitration, and therefore emphasizes the necessity for direct agreement between the two nations concerned.

Bolivia's Position

Bolivia's acceptance of such an arrangement would amount to surrender. At the moment her military situation is unhappy, and the question is whether she can hold out long enough to exhaust Paraguay financially. No figures regarding Paraguay's finances have been published since those for the financial year ended November 30, 1931. It is known that she cannot obtain credit and that her pre-war deposit in London is almost exhausted. The Government expropriates half of the value in foreign currencies of all exports, and whereas prices are soaring owing to the inflation of local currency, salaries remain stationary. In September, 1932, the deposits in private banks amounted to 91,805,439 Paraguayan paper pesos and 1,562,846 gold pesos. In September, 1934, paper deposits had increased to 201,207,985 pesos and gold deposits had decreased to 712,240 pesos. The Argentine peso, which is normally worth 17 Paraguayan paper pesos, now varies between 65 and 75 pesos. Paraguay has no aero planes and cannot afford to buy any. She has any number of captured Bolivian guns but no ammunition, and every soldier in the Paraguayan Army is armed with a captured Bolivian rifle. Moreover 260,000 head of cattle a year are requisitioned by the Government for the Army. These have not been paid for yet, and Government employees with salaries of 2,000 pesos a month are living in poverty where once they were comfortably off.

On the other hand the Paraguayans are united behind President Ayala. There has been only one Cabinet change since the war started two and a half years ago, a significant fact in a country which has had five Presidents in one week and is notorious for its political instability. The President himself is an ardent patriot of high ideals, who is strong enough to govern firmly without being a dictator. He speaks English and French fluently and has travelled widely. Under his administration graft has been stamped out of existence, and war profiteers do not exist in Paraguay.

Argentine Interests

Nevertheless it is difficult to understand how Paraguay can stand the financial strain of the war much longer, unless she can count on outside help. No one knows or is willing to admit to what extent powerful Argentine interests in Paraguay may be helping her financially, but it is at least logical to assume that they would not stand by and see the country financially exhausted and themselves ruined. Whether they have helped in a practical way cannot be definitely stated, but with Paraguay near to victory they certainly would not at the last moment withhold their help. This unknown and unacknowledged factor may have a deciding influence during the course of the next few months.

M'Gill Sets Back Harvard Six By 4-1

Triumphs Easily, Taking Lead In First Period On Goals By Duff And Lamb

N. Y. Times

BOSTON, Jan. 9.—McGill's hockey team vanquished the Harvard sextet tonight by 4—1 in the Boston Garden.

Both goalies, Emerson for Harvard and McHugh for McGill, played brilliantly. Were it not for Emerson's many fine saves, the McGill score would have been considerably larger.

Both teams covered closely during the first half of the opening period, neither having a real scoring opportunity. Duff put the Canadian team in front in 13:12 when he took a pass from McLernon, skated in on Emerson, the Harvard goalie, and flipped the disk into the net for the goal.

Harvard Barely Misses Goal

A little more than two minutes later Rollie Lamb drove his own rebound into the net for the second McGill goal. Brown, Harvard spare defense man, forced McHugh to make a difficult save just as the period ended.

Harvard was handicapped by penalties early in the second period, having two men off the ice at one time. However, McGill was unable to capitalize on this advantage, mainly through the fine defensive efforts of Freddie Moseley and Mike Hovenanian.

Penalties also handicapped the Canadian six during the period and the Crimson team peppered shots at McHugh, but in vain.

Mike Hovenanian put the Crimson back in the game thirty-six seconds after the third period started, scoring on a shot from the blue line that McHugh missed.

McHugh Effective in Goal

McGill, playing with a squad of only ten men, appeared to be tired and Harvard dominated the play as the period progressed, peppering McHugh from all angles. McHugh, however, refused to be beaten.

McGill came back late in the period to take the upper hand again when Clayton Crosby, breaking away form a five-man Harvard attack, picked up a loose puck at center ice and beat Emerson for the third McGill goal in 16:28. A minute later another five-men Harvard attack proved disastrous and this time Jean Paul Elie skated the length of the ice to register in 17:39.

The line-up:

$600,000 Is Loss By Cubs In 3 Yrs.

Wrigley Says His Job Will Be To Restore Team To Paying Proposition

N. Y. Times

CHICAGO, Jan. 9—The Chicago Cubs, believed to be a tremendous money maker, have been a financial disappointment for the last three years. Philip K. Wrigley, 40-year-old president, revealed today that the Cubs lost $600,000 in that period. The loss for 1934 was about $200,000.

There are three major reasons for the huge deficit, Wrigley explained. These are: Falling off in attendance, generous salaries to players and a tremendous cash expenditure for the purchase of stars, some of whom failed to reach the form expected of them.

"No club owner, no matter how much money he has, can continue to lose money at such a rate," Wrigley declared. "My job, as president of the team and director of its policies, will be to restore the Cubs to a paying proposition."

Asked if the 1935 payroll of the club would be lower than last year's, Wrigley replied: "Not much. It will be better balanced, however. Our payroll cannot be much lower for us to maintain a club that we believe has a good chance to win the National League championship this year."

In balancing the team's payroll, Wrigley indicated that some of the stars who failed last season would find their salaries slightly cut, while the deserving youngsters and veterans would be given rises.

Wrigley pointed out that the Cubs lost about $50,000 less last year than in 1933. The 1934 loss included the purchase of high priced players, among them Chuck Klein, purchased from the Phillies for a reported $75,000; Big Bill Lee, a pitcher, who cost $30,000; Tuck Stainback and Roy Joiner. Added to this sum was the $22,000 salary paid Klein last season and $19,000 for Babe Herman.

Wrigley said the Cubs had lost more money than any major league team in the last three years. "I am in the game for the sport of it," Wrigley added, "whether the club makes money or not, but it is essential that the club break nearly even or show a little profit."

Yankee Invalids Regaining Health

Combs, Dickey, Walker, Allen And Van Atta Expect To Be In Top Form This Year

By JOHN DREBINGER

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, Jan. 10—Although a number of perplexing problems may still confront Manager Joe McCarthy as he views the Yankees' 1935 pennant prospects from his Winter retreat in Buffalo, at least some of his worries appear to have lifted.

For Business Manager Ed Barrow announced yesterday that he has just received a highly favorable report on the health and general physical condition of some of the most distinguished Yankee invalids of 1934 and that even should all else fail in 1935, indications are that the invalids, at least, will not.

Barrow received the report from his scout, Johnny Nee, who for the past month or so has been conducting a sort of house-to-house campaign among the Yankee convalescents.

Visited Homes of Five

In all, Nee visited five of the Yanks' outstanding casualties of 1934 and reported all to be coming along in marvelous fashion.

Down in Kentucky he found the silver-thatched Earle Combs scarcely able to await the start of another training season despite the fact this will be his twelfth campaign with the Yanks. Last Summer Combs crashed into a concrete wall in St. Louis, fractured his skull and at the time many felt certain the end had been written to a long and honorable diamond career. But the Kentucky Colonel insists he has recovered completely and that he is ready to wage a hot fight to regain his centre field job.

Next Nee called on Bill Dickey, star catcher, who passed out of the 1934 race in the final month with a broken hand and dislocated finger. Dickey, at the close of the season, had the two injuries reset by Dr. Robert Hyland, noted St. Louis surgeon, and reports the hand to be as good as ever.

The other three reported in good condition are Outfielder Dixie Walker and Pitchers Johnny Allen and Russell Van Atta.

Giants Also Cheered

Good cheer also pervaded the Giants' headquarters yesterday as Secretary Jim Tierney announced the receipt of the eight signed contract to arrive since the 1935 documents were sent out a little more than a week ago. It was from Travis Jackson, the field captain of the Stoneham forces and pride of Waldo, Ark.

Jackson, though his knees buckled under him again late in the 1934 season and he is slated to be succeeded at shortstop this year by the brilliant Dick Bartell, nevertheless still figures very prominently in Manager Terry's 1935 infield plans. For unless the knees give way again Jackson, once the game's outstanding shortstop, is booked to start as the Giants' regular third baseman, a post he filled temporarily with eminent distinction in the memorable world series of 1933.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Longest Train

Probably the longest and heaviest train of cars ever moved with a single locomotive was May 11, 1929 on the Norfolk and Western Railway, when their engine No. 2051, with Engineer J. R. Smith at the throttle, pulled into Iaeger, W. Va. with 183 cars all loaded to the limit with coal. This immense train was nearly two miles long, and its gross weight of 17,500 tons is equal to the weight of many an ocean liner.

And Believe It or Not the train was 185 feet longer when it started up than it was when standing still, because slack in such a train, amounts to approximately one foot for each car.

The Slowest Poet

Francois de Malherbe (1555-1628) was court poet of France from 1605-1628, and as such was the poet laureate of his country. He is credited with having purified the French language and with having started a new era in French poetry. Racine, Moliere and Corneille are said to have been spiritual disciples of Malherbe. He usually spent a long time on each line, but established a record in deliberation when he spent 3 years on the line mentioned which occurs in his "Ode a Groulart"; a poetic blast against atheism.

Bennett Outlines New Deal Plans

Unemployment Insurance And Old-Age Pension Both Listed By Premier

Canada's New Deal was given another boost in a radiocast by Prime Minister R. B. Bennett. In his first talk he surprised his hearers by frankly admitting that the present capitalist system had serious defects and must be radically reformed. In the second he disclosed some of these proposed reforms as contributory unemployment insurance, a remodeled old-age pension scheme, health, sickness and accident insurance, amended income tax laws to correct inequality in wealth distribution, minimum wage laws and maximum hours of work and further beneficial legislation on behalf of the farmer. There must be an end to child labor and to sweatshop conditions, he declared, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. Bennett said that for the past 30 years he had been closely associated with big business and finance and was thoroughly conversant with their ways. One of the best tests of the efficiency of the system was employment, and the fact that unemployment was still rampant proved the system needed correction. There is a grave inequality of income as between the producer and the non-producer which cannot indefinitely continue without serious injury to our whole economic system, he continued. A better plan of taxation must be devised at once. He would put an end to direct relief, or the dole, by providing work for all.

"Special measures will be devised so that the replacement of men by machines may be noted by the public authorities and steps taken to affect such adjustments as will ensure that employees do not suffer hardships by reason of this normal progressive development of the industrial machine," and "no man must be left to the uncertainties of private charity or to the humiliation of government gratuity," Mr. Bennett maintained.

This sudden swing toward Socialism in an effort to save capitalism by reforming it, is dubbed by his political opponents as simply a bid for public favor preceding the general elections. He has swung into alignment with many of the policies of J. S. Woodsworth, leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation of Labor, Farmer and Socialist groups, and appears to be disarming Mackenzie King's Liberals before they have had achance to strike a blow in Parliament.

Stalin Tightens Party Reins To Awe Dissenters

Kremlin Moves To Build Up 'Loyalty' By Ousting Of All Doubtful Groups

Since the arrest in December of Gregory Zinoviev and Leo Kamenev and the execution of a number of their former adherents in the Communist party, Josef V. Stalin, secretary of the party, and his principay aids are disclosed as more concerned about their control of the party machine than about further resistance of opposition elements outside the ranks.

Perhaps it would be better to say that the mature reaction of the Kremlin to the assassination of Sergei M. Kirov, of the all-powerful Politiburo, is to be found in its decision to leave no stone unturned to assure the absolute obedience and loyalty on the part of every party member as the first means of meeting resistance elsewhere whenever it may occur, says Ralph W. Barnes in the New York Herald Tribune. Doubtful elements in the party organization, especially those which in the past have had any connection with the former Trotzky-Zinovie opposition, are to be rooted out ruthlessly.

Party Dissenters "Silent"

There is no thought of implying here that at present there is any effective opposition within the party. Whatever the number of dissenters, they have no means of expressing themselves and thus are no immediate menace to the present leadership.

It becomes clear day by day, meanwhile, that the execution, soon after the assassination of Kirov, of 103 so-called White Guards, arrested some time before, as largely a terrorist measure by the government. The Kremlin decided to strike a blow that would throw fear into any one who, whatever his motive, might be contemplating the "liquidation" of a high Soviet official. The summary trials and executions were considered calculated to have the required effect.

It is interesting to note in this connection that the Soviet press did not go far in attempting to link the "White Guards" with Leonid S. Nikolaev, assassin of Kirov. The line which the party leadership finally hit upon as the proper explanation of the assassination was revealed only when, two weeks afterward, "Izvestia" began to revile members of the former Zinoviev-Trotsky opposition.

Farm Official Expelled

The wrath of the party leadership has struck in high places again, for I. I. Reingold, chief of the cotton section of the Commissariat of Agriculture, has been expelled from the party ranks on a charge that he maintained too close relations with an oppositionist named Saivilovich, a former member of the Zinoviev-Trotsky group, who was arrested last month, together with Zinoviev and Kamenev.

A dispatch from Minsk reports that Vice-Chairman Golenda of the Sovnarkom (Council of People's Commissars) of White Russia and chairman of the White Russian Planning Commission, is under fire for his alleged connection with "remnants of the Trotsky-Zinoviev opposition." The party Central Committee of White Russia is considering charges preferred against him.

"Trotzky Protest" Published

A protest against the attempt of Soviet authorities to link his name with the assassination of Sergei M Kirov was made on January 12 by Leon Trotsky in an article published by the Paris weekly paper of Russian emigres, "Seven Days." The authenticity of the long statement was reported and guaranteed by the editor, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

The former Soviet military leader said the "intrigue" against him was a Machiavellian maneuver of Josef V. Stalin, secretary of the Soviet Communist party, and the Soviet secret police to discredit him by linking his name with "world imperialists."

The article was said by the weekly to have been written by Trotsky on December 30 in his refuge in Auvergne, in central France. Until now, althouh his presence on French territory has been admitted officially by the authorities, the actual place where Trotsky lives has been kept secret for fear of an attempt on his life. Since his departure from Barbizon, near Paris, where he was accidentally discovered by newspaper men, the exiled Communist has remained silent.

The article was said to have been brought to Paris on January 5 as Trotsky's first public statement since again going into hiding. It would be difficult to say whether it is genuine, for it appears unlikely that he would give his protest to a paper published by White Russian emigrants. However, Russians here believe that the article may have fallen into the hands of the White Russians by accident.

Chinese Student Enrollment In US Schools High

American Campus Is Host To Largest Number Since Year 1929

The American campus is today host to the largest number of Chinese students since 1929 according to Mr. Arthur A. Young whose article to the Christian Science Monitor follows:

Not for several years have so many young men and women left their homes in China to study in American institutions of higher learning. China, if one is to judge by her new campus representatives, is looking ahead.

Coincident with this growth in Chinese student enrollment is a rebirth of Chinese student activities on the American campus. More than over before, the Chinese student of today typifies the best that Chinese civilization has to offer. He is, in nine cases out of ten, a leader. Perhaps known for his academic record, or his prowess in athletics, or for distinguished ancestry, he represents what educators have been seeking for a generation—the type of foreign student who can profit best by an exchange of culture with American students.

Recently, Chinese students from Yale, Harvard, Philadelphia, Cornell, Bryn Mawr, Chicago, gathered in New York to celebrate the twenty-fifth birthday of one of the pioneer student organizations on the American campus. Organized on the campus of Colgate University by C. T. Wang, graduate of Yale who later became Chinese Minister of Foreign Affais, the Chinese Students' Christian Association has been serving its fellow members for a quarter of a century. Its alumni and alumnae are active in all walks of Chinese life, many performing distinguished service in their native-land in education, government, medical and social work.

Among the alumni who attended the dinner was Dr. W. P. Wei, a graduate of Amherst, who served as the association's fifth president. Dr. Wei is now the Chinese Purchasing Agent in the United States. Another was Robert T. K. Kah, now Consul General for China in Chicago. Mr. Kah served with Jimmy Yen, Dr. Herman C. E. Liu, and others, in the Chinese forces in France during the World War—recruits of the association. Two former members, Dr. Francis C. M. Wei, president of Hua Chang College, and President C. J. Lin of Fukien Christian University, are now lecturing in American cities.

For the past 25 years, Chinese students have been in the vanguard of Chinese progress. They have been unceasing in their work against the rigidity of the old order. It was while studying at Columbia that Dr. Hu Shin got the idea that later blossomed into the movement known as "The Chinese Renaissance,"—a movement made possible through modernizing the Chinese written language. They were active in overthrowing the old Manchu dynasty. They led parades and demonstrations against what they felt to be western imperialism. They denounced religious controversies.

"In the United States," said Mr. Charles D. Hurrey, general secretary of the Committee on Friendly Relations Among Foreign Students, "we have heard their protests for many years against unequal treaties and discriminating immigration legislation by the United States and Canada. With unusual patience they have endured much misrepresentation of their country and people in America.

"With the vigorous efforts of these men and women, many Americans are in full sympathy. They recognize that Chinese students have thus been the means of bringing about important changes of attitude and modifications of policy on the part of individuals and organizations in America dealing with China."

The Chinese student of 1935 is quite a different person from the one of 1909. How can one distinguish him from other student ambassadors from abroad?

He is likely to be a graduate student specializing in such fields as political science or electrical engineering. He shows very little interest in Western philosophy and literature. He spends one to three years in the United States. He is about 26 years old.

His father is a business man, sometimes a professor, but seldom an editor. He is usually the first-born, if he is a son, reflecting the practice of providing the eldest son in China with the best possible educational opportunity. If he is not a first-born, he is sure to hold a government or foundation scholarship. He comes from a small family, usually of three.

As a student, he is likely to rank among the best in his class. When he fails in his studies, which is rare, the cause is likely to be insufficient knowledge of English or poor health, not lack of academic ability.

Academically, he knows what he wants. He does not change his courses.

The University of Michigan student goes in for social life more than the Chinese students on many another campus. The Purdue student on the other hand is likely to scorn such activities as reading newspapers, listening to radio, going to movies or attending picnics. On the whole, the Chinese student spends more time in studies than American students; less time in theaters, socials, or concerts.

He consciously suppresses his social and emotional expression. This is largely due to his background and his loneliness in a strange country. In spite of his modern ways when in China, he is conservative about making social engagements with women students on the American campus. He is, however, learning to chum with American-born Chinese, as more and more of the latter are going to college. Toward Japan he is definitely opposed, but he bears no personal animosity against individual Japanese students, which are placed in vertical file folders and filed in my personal office file drawer. The cards are filed in regular 3x5 card index drawers in alphabetical order. The information on the card is, for example: On the card headed "E—Scrapbook" is entered "Explaining, Patient, 80." meaning that the article entitled "Patient Explaining" may be found on page 80 of the general scrapbook file. On another card headed "G—Scrapbook" might be found the name of the author. This file has become a valuable quick reference storehouse of ready material for the solving of many problems, thanks to the multitude of thoughtful contributors to these Monitor pages.

John Lawrence Sullivan, who has been justly termed the "Champions", he having met and defeated more first-class contenders than any other pugilist, displayed fondness for athletics early in life and his boxing prowess won him the title of "Strong Boy" during his public school days.

At the age of 24 he defeated the famous Paddy Ryan for the championship of the world at Missippi City, Miss., Feb. 7, 1882. His fights during the following year were all short affairs, and in September 1883 Sullivan started on a tour of the United States under the management of Al Smith, who offered $1,000 to any man who could stand up before the champion for four rounds. He made short work of all opponents, including some of the best men in the country. During one of these fights at San Francisco, March 6, 1884, an opponent, G. M. Robinson, went down 68 times in four rounds to avoid punishment.

Over 200 US-Born Japanese Going To Lincoln Fair

More Than 200 Members Of America-Japan Society Accept Bids

No event planned by the America-Japan Society in its 18 years' history promises more far-reaching results for international goodwill than does the Society's Lincoln County Fair to be held at 6:30 p.m. Tuesday the Mitsukoshi Department Store at Nihonbashi. It is the first of several new undertakings mapped out for 1935 under the guidance of the Society's newly formed Committee on Activities; Tuesday's unique affair is to be the organization's first annual welcome reception to the rapidly growing group of American-born Japanese young people who are coming to Japan from the United States and Hawaii for study and cultural purposes.

Under the direction of Mr. Tadashi Komatsu, Chairman of the Activities Committee and planned by the sub-Committee on Program headed by Mr. George N. Coe, Chairman and Mr. Ichita Taguchi, Vice-Chairman, the welcome reception will duplicate all the glamor and merry-making of a typical American county fair. The event has been designated the Lincoln birthday of Abraham Lincoln. More than 200 active members of the Society had made reservations up to Friday at the headquarters of the America-Japan Society in the Imperial Hotel and approximately 250 young American born Japanese young people had accepted the Society's invitation to be its guests.

700 In Tokyo

In making a careful survey of the County Fair to commemorate the young overseas Japanese now residing in Tokyo and vicinity, more than 700 names of young men and women have been listed through the good offices of the Foreign Office, the American Consulate General's office, the Pacific Young People's Society and various universities. This survey has brought to light the fact that the American-born Japanese are coming here in far greater numbers than has been heretofore realized for study purposes in the land of their ancestors.

At the Activities Committee luncheon meeting held on Thursday at the New Grand Restaurant, several members pointed out how the Society now has a most unusual opportunity to welcome this group to Japan and help them acquire a more thorough knowledge of their ancestral land during their average two or three years of study period here before returning again to the United States.

Through the cooperation of Mr. Y. Kitada, Managing Director, the Mitsukoshi store has placed at the Society's disposal the entire sixth floor of the Nihonbashi plant, with dining room facilities for several hundred, an auditorium seating 600 and the adjoining lounge rooms and corridors, as well as the staff of the store. To ensure success for the venture—the building of new friendships between America-Japan Society members and the group of young overseas Japanese—everything will be entirely informal. All members and guests have been requested to use the entrance on the Mitsui Bank side of the building where Mr. Komatsu and his Committee of 26 members composed of Mr. S. J. Albright, Mr. J. C. Ankenny, Mr. D. H. Blake, Mr. Roger W. Burman, Mr. J. H. Chapman, Mr. George N. Coe, Haron Ino Dan, Mr. Keikichi Doi, Mr. Russell L. Durgin, Mr. Yasunosuke Fukukita, Mr. Yukichi Iwanaga, Mr. Chuji Kabayama, Mr. Kazue Kanakura, Mr. Ryozo Mishima, Mr. Yoshiharu Nagashima, Mr. Yozo Nomura, Mr. John Reifsnider, Mr. Paul Rusch, Mr. Soichi Saito, Mr. J. C. Sample, Mr. Teizo Shiohara, Mr. Harry L. Sommerer, Mr. Icita Taguchi, Mr. Jinnosuke Takaku, Mr. Frank S. Williams and Mr. James R. Young will receive them and introduce those attending to the delights of the Midway.

Komatsu Is Chairman

Guests and members will be carried direct to the sixth floor auditorium by special elevators where the evening's program begins with an informal gathering over which Mr. Komatsu will preside as Master of Ceremonies. Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, president of the society, will welcome the young guests and members and greetings will be extended on behalf of American resident members by Mr. John L. Curtis, who is also president of the American Association of Tokyo. Mr. Kiyoshi Miura, a native of California and student at Meiji University and former president of the Pacific Young People's Society, largest organized group of American-born Japanese students in Tokyo, will respond on behalf of the young overseas guests.

While the members and their guests are assembling, Mr. Robert Moss will lead the participants in mass singing of favorite American folk songs. After a brief half hour of introduction and getting acquainted, the 600 expected members and guests will be guided through gaily decorated corridors to the large dining hall of the store. En route through the corridors will be located many booths and food stands where, all will be served a variety of foods, ranging from tempura and soba and Japanese delicacies to American sandwiches, soups, salads, hot dogs and ice cream. Attendants at each of the stands will be costumed in carnival garb and at the booths where Japanese foods will be served, in costumes similar to those found at native special restaurants.

Passing from the long corridors and food booths, the party will enter the large dining hall, which will be arranged much like the midways found at American county fairs. Here all members will be invited to try their luck at fish ponds, throwing baseballs at human targets, demonstrate their skill with oversized quoits, at indoor rifle ranges, on archery courts, by using the latest devices for indoor golf, or take turns at trick auto rides, or be weighed at "guest your weight" scales, with their attendant ballyhoo men shouting to the crowds.

Movie Show Planned

After a round of the county fair features, the guests will be guided back to the auditorium where they will see previews of a new Mickey Mouse and Silly Symphony feature sound picture. Next follows an unusual sound film brought to Japan two weeks ago by Mr. Herbert Hunter, showing some of the outstanding plays at last season's greatest American foot ball games. A brief skit including a group of popular songs sung by the Schwell Sisters, three popular young Tokyo ladies who broadcast to America in the Last America-Japan Fourth of July hook-up, will follow after which Mr. George N. Col, Chairman of Program Committee will bring the evening to a close.

All members of the Society or invited guests who have not sent in their acceptances are urged to do so at once or telephone the Society's Secretary, Mr. Yenji Takeda at the America-Japan Society office in the Imperial Hotel. The many features of the County Fair entail considerable planning and the Activities Committee wishes to be prepared to take care of all members and guests who wish to attend.

The only charge for the entire evening's entertainment which includes dinner as well as all other features is covered in the subscription charge of ¥3 per person. The young overseas people are guests of the Society for the evening.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Human Jumping Bean

A German acrobat, Max Reinhardt, jumps backward balancing on his head from one pedestal to another with the pedestals placed one foot apart. He leaps in this manner over a series of five pedestals, making a total of four complete head balance jumps in succession. At no time during this stunt does any portion of his body except his head touch the pedestals or the floor, his jumping power being produced by a combination of leg jerk and head spring. Reinhardt spent two years mastering this difficult trick.

DR. WEIGLE SPEAKS

Under the auspices of six theological seminaries, Dr. Luther A. Weigle delivered the first of a series of adresses which he will give in Japan during a 10-day lecture tour, at the Luthern Theological Seminary Saturday. With his wife and family, Dr. Weigle, dean of the divinity school of Yale University, arrived in Yokohama Saturday morning on the President Coolidge.

More than 130 persons, Japanese and foreigners, heard Dr. Weigle's talk given Saturday under the auspices of the Tokyo, Nippon, Aoyama, Kwanto, Kyoritsu and Japan Luthern Seminaries.

Dr. Weigle, who visited Japan 15 years ago, will sail from Kobe on February 17. In his talk Saturday, he emphasized the need of salvation to purge and purify "the fast-corrupting hearts of the peoples of the world today."

He said, "I don't pretend to know much of Japan, but in our own America even the so-called 'New Deal' has done but little so far in helping the people out of their moral difficulties and degeneration, though it has done a good deal by way of improving the material side of national life."

He insisted upon the urgent need of educating adults. "We all realize the importance of children's education," said he, "but can we wait for the coming generation twenty years after, doing nothing, in the meantime, for the grown-up people who sorely need a better and more effective education themselves?"

Dr. Weigle most forcibly urged his audience to recognize the impending necessity of educating people in general so as to have them awaken to the fact that they need immediate salvation of their hearts and minds.

He said, "In Jesus Christ human and divine natures were so perfectly combined that His whole life was the very incarnation of Love, the love of the whole humanity with infinite mercy and benevolence.

"Only by studying His life and faithfully following His noble examples shown for us during His rather short life we can hope to attain the salvation of our souls that is most needed at present."

In conclusion, Dr. Weigle told his audience a story of his younger days.

While he was a student in a college he joined a certain association which his father had forbidden him to join. He kept this secret for five years. When he entered a theological seminary, however, one evening he happened to preach to his fellow-students for the first time in his life. Even while he was preaching his awakened conscience began to assail him most violently. He had never felt such a sharp sting of conscience before. On finishing his preaching he hastened to his own room, and there he shut himself up. After a long deliberation with himself in anguish and repentance he at last made up his mind to make a clean breast of it and ask his father's pardon.

An answer came immediately after from his father, who told him that he was very glad to know of his final confession and was quite willing to forgive him. The father added that he knew when his son joined the association five years before, and had been waiting for his voluntary confession.

Florida Expects Influx Of Jobless

Governor Asks Other States To Help Turn Back Horde Of Drifters

This is the season when Florida's social structure undergoes a change that brings anxiety as well as delight to permanent residents, for along with the several hundred thousand visitors who have wealth or only modest means come many indigent individuals who give law enforcement officers considerable trouble, according to the New York Times.

Last Winter the influx included an alarmingly large number who sought to prey upon the unsuspecting for a livelihood, and there is ample evidence that the parasitic are back to try their luck again. They are encountering a severely inhospitable attitude, however, for police departments have prepared for them, and the public has learned to be more suspicious. Newspapers have began to warn desirable visitors as well as permanent residents, for there is an eagerness to protect those who are here for a legitimate visit.

Border Patrol Suggested

Governor Dace Sholtz has taken a hand in the matter by announcing to all and sundry of the jobless that stringent measures will be resorted to if there is the slightest necessity for such a step. He has also appealed to Governors of eleven other States to cooperate in keeping back the usual horde of drifters. He has gone so far as to suggest a patrol along the Georgia-Florida line to investigate the status of those whose appearance arouses suspicion, asserting that the situation "is one of the greatest perils that has ever threatened the State."

Many business men and farmers, especially citrus growers and packing house operators, are discouraging the jobless visitors by explaining at the outset that they have no work for applicants from other States. Although this inevitably works an unjust hardship in some instances, it has proved an effective measure in many instances.

The problem has become even more acute since the cold wave of a few days ago. The coldest weather that visited Florida since 1894-95 did extensive damage to the citrus crop and ruined the large acreage of vegetables. While this means that many farmers must start anew financially, it also means that many more unskilled laborers have been thrown out of employment. The visitors, therefore, now have much less chance of finding work than they had two or three weeks ago.

Only a few mornings ago an able-bodied man, apparently about 30 years old and unmistakable Northern in speech, knocked at the door asked for breakfast and a little pocket change. He had spent the previous night in a vacant house beside a lake 2000 yards away. Inquiry revealed that he was from New York, had worked the wheat fields of Kansas and then hitchhiked ahead of cold weather to Florida, where he had made many unsuccessful efforts to land a job. He had no kind words for Florida and doubtless was ready to turn to larceny to get bodily needs. He was given aid and advised to go to some other State, where the transient jobless are not so numerous.

Similar scenes are being enacted all over the State just now, and it is to avoid a dangerous increase of such cases that steps are being taken toward concerted action. Refused work, these drifters must either turn to charitable organizations or steal, and the charitable organizations say they already are taking care of the largest possible number.

Federal transient camps can take care of a maximum of 11,000, and that limit was reached some time ago. Prospective applicants who have not yet reached Florida should be warned quickly that they will be bitterly disappointed. This is contrary to a report broadcast through the other States several weeks ago. It inadvertently or erroneously urged the jobless to come to balmy Florida, and failed to point out that normally balmy weather does not keep one from needing food and clothes.

Police Will Handle Problem

Time was when professional panhandlers found easy pickings here, but increasingly wary residents are learning to turn a cold shoulder. This Winter everybody is being urged to let police or other authorities deal directly with the more nomically speaking."

Ireland Puts Hope In Full Autonomy

Sean O'Kelly On Visit To U.S. Holds Amity With England Depends On Separation

The establishment of a united Ireland, free from dominion status, is the only solution of the problem of continued disputes between the Irish Free State and the United Kingdom, Sean T. D'Kelly, Vice President of the Irish Free State Executive Council, asserted recently in an interview during his visit to the U.S.

Declaring that the Irish Free State is "not only ready but anxious to let bygones be bygones and be friends with England in the future," Mr. O'Kelly contended that friendly relations between the two countries would not be successfully concluded "unless and until" Ireland's national aspirations were finally recognized, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

"The Treaty of 1921 and the Constitution of the Irish Free State adopted in 1922, made us a member of the British Commonwealth," Mr. O'Kelly said. "We are not content with that status. We wish—the vast majority of the whole Irish people, north and south—for complete independence. That is what our nation has fought for and made great sacrifices for centuries.

Dislikes "Dominion" Title

"Ireland is not an England colony. We dislike the title 'Dominion.' Our aim is to be completely free. When our freedom is won and recognized we would be quite content to be on the most friendly terms with England. She is our nearest neighbor and the natural market for our products.

"There is no hatred of England in Ireland. There is and always has been a strong dislike of dictation and interference. These latter once removed, we would most certainly live in peace and harmony with England and the new conditions that would result could be of untold advantage to England as well as to ourselves."

Dscussing the recent trade agreement reached by the two countries in which Ireland agreed to buy 1,000,000 tons of English coal annually in return for England's purchasing 150,000 extra head of cattle each year, Mr. O'Kelly termed the agreement "a good bargain" for the Irish Free State.

"The recent agreement 'will' help to reduce our cattle surplus,' he pointed out. "Cattle is a big problem with us just now. We are endeavoring to remake our national economy. We want to make Ireland a properly balanced country economically speaking.

Shielding City Dwellers From Air Is Big Problem

tection of their dwellers presents a most serious problem to their civil authorities.

Shelters Are Limited

"If there were any possibility of sheltering the entire population in subterranean refuges that would be proof against bombs and gas, the problem would not be difficult. But here we are faced with a material impossibility. No country has richer enough to cover the costs of such an undertaking, and there is always the chance that shelters which would be safe from attacks today might not be proof against the means of attack that might be available tomorrow.

"There is no use thinking of trying to shelter the whole population of a great city within its own limits, and for that reason there is every necessity of decreasing the congestion of a threatened urban population by the removal of a part of the inhabitants. By this process of reasoning we arrive at the important problem of dispersion.

"In the first place it must be borne in mind that this problem only holds in all its complexity for smaller conters which are especially menaced. With this understood, we can examine under what conditions an effective dispersion can be accomplished.

"The inhabitants of such a town as we have under consideration could be classed in three categories. The first category would comprise all those persons who without any great inconvenience to themselves might leave the city and live elsewhere throughout the duration of hostilities. These persons would be immediately evacuated once and for all and their establishment elsewhere would be permanent.

"There is a second category of persons composed of families, certain members of which might be required in the city during the day but might be able to leave it during the night. This would include workmen and employes of every kind. These persons, who would be obliged to commute to the city and away from it, would be subject to daily dispersion. Some members of their families, including women, children and aged parents, would come under the first category and be evacuated permanently.

"The third category of inhabitants would include all those persons who for reasons of their essential services might be needed within the city upon all occasions day and night. This would include the defenders of the city, the police, the Fire Department employes and others, and they would not be subject to any of the measures undertaken for dispersion.

Placing Excess Inhabitants

"The aim would be to place the evacuated inhabitants within the district or administrative department of France in which their homes are located. From the moral point of view it is essential that the citizens should not be too thoroughly uprooted. In certain exceptionally large agglomerations, such as Paris, Lyons and Marseilles, a special zone of dispersion in one or more neighboring departments can be assigned.

"The problem of dispersion includes questions of transportation, housing and lodging, which can only be mentioned in passing, and which, though involving delicate matters, are nervertheless capable of solution, for unhappily they are not new problems. These details must be studied and prepared in such a way that they can be put into operation instantly at the moment required."

The general here examined another question which is much discussed in France, where there is increasing talk of a "surprise attack."

"It is difficult to admit," he said, speaking from the viewpoint of a military technician, "that an air attack could be carried out without any warning whatsover that the danger was imminent. If such a thing should happen, it would have to be faced with all its consequences, and the plan of dispersion put into execution as soon as possible.

A First Measure" in Wars

"But it is logical to suppose that period of political tension, giving warning of danger of war, would precede the actual opening of hostilities. Since it is not less logical to suppose that these would commence by air raids, it follows that the application of the plan of dispersion should be one of the first measures of safeguard to be taken against danger from the air.

"Once this plan has been carried out and the city relieved of its congestion, the remaining inhabitants must in some way be protected. Shelters must be provided for posts of the military command, for the different relief services and for the people in general.

"Admitting that full protection, as has been said, is impossible, the effort will be to have as many refuges as possible available, and for this purpose existing cellars, the subway tubes and underground areas can be utilized. These will give the inhabitants relative protection against small-calibre bombs and fragments of bombs, and can be made to give safety from gas. There must be an effort to see that such shelters are within convenient range of the persons who will be obliged to risk their lives by remaining in the danger centers in wartime.

"I believe I have shown," concluded General Duchene, "that valuable protection against loss of life in air raids is possible. It can, of course, be only comparatiave protection, but the more efficiently it is prepared the more effective it will be. Among the measures that can be taken I believe that the plan for diminishing the vulnerability of great cities by dispersion of the population is one of the most efficacious, provided it is systematically prepared and not improvised. Responsible civil authorities are duty bound to look now to these preparations in detail."

Ball Clubs Vote Against Advent Of Dog Racing

National League Members Reject Proposal To Use Braves' Field

By JOHN DREBINGER

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, Jan. 19—After sitting in session almost continuously for thirteen hours, the club owners of the National League emerged from their headquarters in the RCA Building shortly before midnight last night with an answer apparently found to their perplexing Boston dog racing problem.

The solution was that there will be no dog racing at Braves Field, and the Braves will continue to do business on their old stamping grounds this Summer. All that now remains to be ironed out are certain financial difficulties involving the Braves which had League hopes to have satisfactorily adjusted by the time of its regular Spring meeting in this city on February 5.

The dog racing issue so far as it concerned Braves Field or any entangling alliance with the Braves was virtually wiped out at the opening of the session at 10 o'clock yesterday morning. A resolution was unanimously adopted in which the league placed itself squarely on record as being opposed to allowing any of its clubs to play baseball on premises used jointly with the greyhounds.

Both President Judge E. Fuchs and Vice President Charles P. Adams, representing the Braves, voted for the resolution.

An Involved Question

This done, the magnates then tackled the financial status of the Boston club, and so involved apparently was the matter that it kept the owners in session until after 11 o'clock last night.

At the close of the session President Ford C. Frick, who presided over the special meeting, issued the following statement:

"The National League today discussed the entire Boston situation at considerable length and we believe there has been evolved a plan of procedure which will eventually work out successfully.

"The plan very naturally cannot be announced until various details have been completed. Judge Fuchs and Mr. Adams are returning to Boston tonight with the intention of seeking certain parties unpresented today whose interests must be considered.

"The entire situation, we feel confident, will be clarified and definitely settled at the schedule meeting on Feb. 5. We believe that the Boston baeseball public will be entirely satisfied with the solution of the problem."

Writers Are Mystified

The statement at first left the waiting baseball correspondents a trifle mystified inasmuch as it made no direct reference to the Braves continuing at Braves Field. President, made a special request to the newspaper men that they please ask no further questions.

However, when one of the writers pointedly asked Judge Fuchs whether he plannd continuing at Braves Field, he answered:

"Certainly we will continue at Braves Field. As a matter of fact, the Braves have never been out of Braves Field, and while there are still a number of details which must be adjusted, I feel confident all will come out all right."

He denied flatly tha tany existing relations between the proposed dog-racing project and Braves Field could in any way interfere with the decision that the Braves would occupy their grounds next Summer as sole tenants.

"The truth is," said the Boston president, "that the question of dog racing was eliminated from all discussion almost the moment we went into session. Knowing in advance the pronounced feeling against having the Braves combine with any dog racing enterprise on Braves Field next Summer, both Mr. Adams and myself went to the meeting fully decided that we would make no attempt to get the other owners to change their position. The Boston clup therefore voted with all the others for the resolution barring dog racing from ball parks."

Landis Is Pleased

Incidentally, word that the resolution had been unanimously passed was telephoned to Commissioner Kenesaw M. Landis who is vacationing in Chandler, Ariz. According to President Frick the information was highly pleasing to the commissioner who, it was known, was ready to wager a bitter fight on his own behalf had any attempt been made to line the greyhounds up with baseball.

The resolution with regard to dog racing follows:

"At a meeting of the National League this morning the club owners and representatives again went on record as being unalterably opposed to playing National League baseball games in any place or park where dog racing is held or permitted."

It was not revealed what financial difficulties remain to be surmounted before the Braves can be definitely said to be riding on an even keel again. But the impression among local observers is that the situation apparently has reached a point where the league itself is ready to step in and lend what aid is needed to operate the club so that there will be no break in the ranks.

A report that this latter move might mean the withdrawal of Judge Fuchs as president of the club was vigorously denied by the Judge himself.

The Judge's positive assertion that the Braves would continue on their own grounds also set at rest any furthe speculation as to whether the team might arrange to play its home games at Fenway Park, Park, the American League field Boston.

Plan Reported For Making U.S. Supreme In Air

Said To Embody 4,000 Army Planes And Three New Navy Dirigibles

Recommendations for raising the army airplane forces to 400 planes, the addition of three new airships to the Navy's existing fleet of one and government entrance into commercial airship transportation on a major scale were understood to be before President Roosevelt recently in the report of the Federal Aviation Commission, says the Christian Science Monitor.

The report will eventually be transmitted to Congress with the President's recommendations for appropriate legislative action. But it will not go until Mr. Roosevelt has made the text of the report coincide with his own views. This, it is reliably understood, will involve substantial changes in the text of the report as submitted recently.

Other important features, which also may undergo executive amendment, provide for co-ordination of all the civil aviation activities of the Government into a single unit devised in such form that it could at some future date be absorbed bodily by a uniform federal transportation agency.

Actual Text Not Yet Out

Although the actual text of the report is being kept secret until it goes to Congress in final modified form, it is known that the biggest benefactors under it are the Army and the Goodyear-Zeppelin Corporation of Akron, Ohio. In other important respects, the report is understood to follow lines of thought which have already been generally developed and proposed by competent authority.

For example it favors a system of army air defense bases which is in complete accord with the plans already being put into effect by the Army. These plans call for a mobile general headquarters air force independent of the Army Air Corps, plus establishment of the actual air corps in "wings" located at strategic points on the coasts of continental United States and on island possessions.

Another feature which has been generally recognized in aviation circles for a long time as desirable is unification of the government civil aviation agencies. This would involve merging of the Department of Commerce's Bureau of Aeronautics, the Post Office Department's air mail activities and the special meteorological services which the Weather Bureau has developed for aviation.

On Controversial Ground

It was only on airships and Army Air Corps that the commission got into highly controversial ground and it is on these two subjects that the President is considered most likely to make radical changes in the present text of the report.

Whether he will permit to go to Congress recommending a vast fleet of 4000 airplanes for the Army, more than double the present strength of the service, is considered highly problematical. It is equally uncertain that the long-cherished dreams of airship enthusiasts will actually mature into three new air giants for the Navy and American entry into commercial airship transportation.

The latter case is weakened by the navy's apathy. With a few exceptions such as Commander Rosendahl who survived the Shenandoah disaster and Commander Wiley, who came unscathed out of the Akron tragedy, most of the navy's higher professional officials are willing to be relieved of the responsibility of experimenting further with a type of ship which has cost them heavily in lives and is still, in their opinion, of uncertain value to the fleet.

Expect Pressure to Bear

The chance is therefore good that navy pressure will be brought to bear on the President to at least cut down the present order for two of the largest ships and one smaller training ship.

Also the case against appropriation of federal funds for the construction of a fleet of transoceanic commercial airships will be presented to the President by officials of the Bureau of Aeronautics, who feel that if large sums are to be spent to develop a new type of aviation they could be used to better advantage in building "seadromes"—giant floating islands. The bureau generally is convinced that the oceans can be spanned by air more effectively if airplanes hopping from one seadrome to another are employed rather than airships.

It has been a long fought-over issue which is at last on the President's desk and about to be settled.

New Symphony Orchestra To Play Russian Artist's Compositions

Mr. Alexander Tcherenpin, Russian pianist and composer who came to Japan last fall will be guest soloist at the 151st subscription concert of the New Symphony Orchestra, to be held at the Hibiya Public Hall, on February 13 at 7:30 p.m. He will play a number of his compositions at this concert and will be accompanied by the orchestra. The Concerto for piano and orchestra Op. 1. F. major, and Festmusik Op. 45 are the selections by this artist which will be rendered that evening.

Mr. Alexander Tcherepin is the son of Mr. Nicolai Tcherenpin, well known Russian pianist and composer. He was born in 1899. His father studied at the Musical Conservatory in Russia and was a conductor for several years. He went to Paris in 1908 where he conducted the orchestra for the Diagirev Dancing troupe. His son studied in Paris under the tutelage of his father and lived there until 1921. He studied the piano and music composition at the Academy of Music in Paris for some time. At the age of 25, he had composed more than 30 musical compositions.

Last autumn, he held a recital to announce his compositions in Tokyo, at the Nippon Seinenkai Hall but this was a private performance. At the concert to be held Wednesday by the New Symphony Orchestra, he will play his own compositions at the piano. The concert will be conducted by Mr. Nicolai Schiferblatt. The following compositions will also be played by the orchestra.

Symphony No. E moll, Op. 98, Brahms.

Cantor Returns From England A Wiser Individual

Famous Comedian Discovers English Are Warm-Hearted-People

The erudite Eddie Cantor, who startled England recently by his profound discussions of the science of traffic regulation, returned to the United States on January 15 after a busy few weeks in Europe, during which he surveyed conditions, interviewed Mussolini, sampled moving pictures and discovered, to his surprise, that the English are an emotional and warm-hearted people, says the New York Times.

He had much on his mind when the French liner Ile de France anchored at Quarantine and when, a few minutes later, a score of reporters and cameramen descended on the Cantors' luxurious suite.

There was, for instance, that evening at sea when he and his fellow-passengers, Feodor Chaliapin and Mischa Elman, two other artists whom Mr. Cantor said he could recommend in the warmest terms, sat around the oval table in the Cantors' living room, talked of this and that, and eventually gave an impromptu variety show for the amusement of Mme. Chaliapin; Boris, the singer's son; Mrs. Cantor and three of the Cantors' five daughters, Marjorie, Natalie and Edna.

"You could not see Chaliapin perform for $20 a ticket as we did," Mr. Cantor related. "He is a fine comedian. Elman sang, and he is a pretty good musician. I, of course, played the violin. Have you ever heard me play? I play 'Humoresque.' That's my piece, and I am good, too."

An Admirer of Mussolini

Mr. Cantor was enthusiastic about Premier Mussolini, whom he called the "policeman of Europe." He had a letter granting him an audience with the dictator, but he left it at his hotel because he wanted it for his scrap book. When he reached Mussolini's palace, soldiers poked bayonets at him everywhere he turned, asking him who he was and what he wanted

Mr. Cantor, who insists on 25 per cent pantomine in all his pictures, tried to show the guards he was a comedian, but without much success.

"They would not even believe I was a comedian when I got down on the floor and rolled my eyes at them and went through all my tricks," he recalled ruefully. "So finally I had to send back to the hotel for the letter, and I saw Mussolini. We had a long talk together. He had seen all my pictures and he asked me if I thought Italy had improved since my last visit a few years ago.

"He's a great man. Everything in Italy is done for the people, and he never lies to them. If he tells them a new road will be opened at 3:30 p.m. on Sept. 14, you can bet your last lira that it will be. Of course, we have had some great statemen over here, but they would have been better if they had not kidded the people."

Mr. Cantor learned during his visit that he speaks Italian fluently. He saw his picture "Roman Scandals," which turned out somehow to be "The Scandals of a Museum." To his surprise, he moved across the screen spouting the liquid syllables of Italy "like nobody's business."

"I never knew it was in me," he boasted. "I'm a great fellow."

As an authority on traffic regulation, Mr. Cantor said he would advocate doing away with the automobile horn because, in his opinion, if speed demons did not have horns they would be more careful.

Predicts Walker Will Return

He saw James J. Walker in London and could report authoritatively that the former Mayor was devoting all his attention to building up his health so he could return to America.

"Jimmy gets up at 9 a.m. every day and gets to bed early at night, eats regularly and has a nap every afternoon," Mr. Cantor said. "That is his one aim, to regain his health and come back home. I want him to get in radio, or go to Hollywood or something like that because he can do it. You know Jimmy is pretty good in the clinches. He's got a good voice and knows how to talk to 'em."

Cantor said he had found the English people "wonderful," and that they had given him the greatest reception accorded an American actor since Chaplin went to London.

Chaliapin, the Russian basso, returned from a tour of France, Germany, Italy, Hunary and Latvia, and will begin his American tour in Kansas City on Jan. 22. He may sing in opera this season, but said this had not been decided. He said he had not been in Russia since 1922 and probably never would return. Boris, his son by an earlier marriage, is a painter. He brought a collection of his work to exhibit here.

Mr. Elman returned from a tour of Italy, Spain, Holland, France and England. He expects to play in the United States until the end of March and then go to Mexico for his first appearance there.

Britain Launches New Dole System

National Board Taking Over From Local Agencies The Administration Of Aid

Britain's new Unemployment Insurance Board took over from local authorities on Jan. 8 the administration of relief under the dole system, which on March 1 will mean taking control of 4,000,000 unemployed persons.

Full centralization of relief work will not be accomplished until March, but 240, local offices that had come into existence the day previous began their work.

Lord Betterton, the former Sir Henry Betterton, is head of the board. He will be personal guardian of Britain's jobless and in effect administrator of government expenditures totaling $275,000,000 annually.

In launching the new plan, Lord Betterton declared it would make for equality of treatment and uniform administrtaion throughout the country. But he added:

"The board is fully alive to the fact that the needs of 1,000,000 families affected cannot be forced into one mold."

He cited the fact that rents varied in different localities and that therefore allowances for rent must vary also. He said allowances for children would be liberalized and more generous provisions would be made for the personal requirements of wage earners.

Applicants will have rights of appeal for this purpose to 150 appeal tribunals set up by the board. The board has wide discretionary powers, but Lord Betterton promised it would not be a "souless machine."

Between now and March 1 the board will have direct control of 750,000 persons and this control will be enlarged after the entire transfer is actually completed.

The proposed changes in the dole system drafted by the unemployment assistance board before Christmas provide allowances of 3 shillings for each child under five years old graduated upward to 10 shillings to dependents 21 years old.

A basic minimum of 24 shillings weekly for man and wife is provided in the new scale of payments, which will apply to unemployed now receiving transitional relief payment and other unemployed whose present help is the poor relief fund.

Harlem's 'Hitler' Gets Jail Term

Sufi Abdul Hamid Sentenced For Speaking In N.Y. Without License

The elegant and stately Sufi Abdul Hamid, often called the "Harlem Hitler," who has been preaching race solidarity and religious skepticism to Harlem Negroes, had the satisfaction on Jan. 19 in Harlem court, New York City of hearing the probation officer confirm some of the most startling statements he had made about his career, but was sentenced to the workhouse for ten days nevertheless, turban and green velvet cloak and all. He said he was going to appeal.

Magistrate Thomas Aurelio had found him guilty on Jan 15. of making a street corner speech without a permit and of hawking a book called "The Black Challenge to White Supremacy," at 25 cents a copy, without a peddler's license, according to the New York Herald Tribune, Four days were allowed for investigation before sentence. The magistrate was not overly impressed by the report of the probation officer, W. T. Mulhern, that the turbaned Negro really was a native of Halfa, in the Egyptian Sudan, being born there January 6, 1903; that he served with the American forces in the World War; that he studied at a European college and had been a lecturer in European cities, and that he was graduated from the Arkheim School of the University of Illinois in Chicago.

Operated Detective Agency

Mr. Muhern reported also that Sufi Abdul Hamid came to the United States about nine years ago, had been a successful salesman and an operative of a detective agency and was vice-president of a concern which deals in cocoanut and palm oil. Mr. Mulhern found it necessary to add that Sufi Abdul Hamid was fined $5 for telling fortunes August 16, 1931, and that he had received a letter from the Citizens' League for Fair Play, Inc., in which Sufi Abdul Hamid was characterized as "a menace to the best interests of Harlem," in the opinion of members of the Citizens' League for Fair Play, Inc.

Regardless of his educational attainments, his right to a turban and a green velvet cloak and his service in American uniform, in the opinion of Magistrate Aurelio, Sufi Abdul Hamid still is "an impostor and a faker." He sentenced the Negro to serve ten days on each charge, relenting, however, to the extent of directing that the sentences run concurrently.

Sufi Abdul Hamid has been arrested serval times and, as the report of the probation officer showed, was not always successful in fighting the charges, but his present enterprise, which even the impartial Mr. Mulhern described as "a racket," have resulted in his first actual jail sentence.

Blames Woes on Tammany

Sufi Abdul Hamid attributes his recent troubles to the jealousy of Tammany Hall, but the police think it more likely the organizations bushwhacking him are much nearer his home, 353 West 118th Street. In addtion to this handicap, Sufi Abdul Hamid has hit upon a campaign this time which requires rabid addresses and the picketing of restaurants and shops in Harlem which do not employ Negroes—activities which attract police attention. So virulent has been his campaign to instill racial feeling in Harlem Negroes that he often is called the "Harlem Hitler."

grams by means of the lottery system.

"I will not allow my pictures to be booked in this way," said Mr. Kawakita in discussing the matter. "I go every year to Europe and select my pictures and take a personal pride in them, as though they were members of my own family.

"In Vienna and Berlin," Mr. Kawakita added, "magnates have attempted to control cinema house, to keep down the cost of the purchasing price of the pictures, but failed because the film distributors boycotted them."

The only answer to a similar move in Japan, Mr. Kawakita thinks, would be to rely upon the small but independent movie-houses for the display of picture programs.

Otto's Hopes Are Dimmed By Rome Pact

Laval-Mussolini Agreement Is Setback To Plans For Hapsburg Restoration

Steenockerzeel Castle, residence of Archduke Otto and therefore headquarters of those who hope for a restored Hapsburg throne in Vienna, has again become a mere listening post in the European field.

A few months ago the entourage of the handsome young head of the exiled royal family was almost certain that the new year would see Otto, his resourceful mother, the former Empress Zita, and his brothers and sisters once more residents of Austria, with the twenty-two-year-old Archduke ready to rule if any call came, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

But the tragic Hapsburg fates again intervened. The Archduke, still Otto de Bar, continues to study for the examination by which he hopes soon to become a doctor in political and social sciences. The optimistic views that were expressed freely by the familiars of the Steenockerzeel have died down.

No Present Hope

"There is not the slightest hope, for the time being, of a turn in the Hapsburg fortunes," said one who is informed of the course of negotiations.

"If restoration comes some day, it will be the result either of successful diplomacy or the signal for the start of a fresh European tragedy.

"Statements by responsible statesmen, non-Austrian as well as Austrian, within the last two months have left no doubt that the restoration is not a question of domestic, but of foreign politics."

And the recent course of international politics has not brought unalloyed satisfaction to the Hapsburg group. Some of them see an additional threat to their hopes in the accord by which Pierre Laval, Foreign Minister of France, and Premier Benito Mussolini of Italy bound their governments to act jointly in guaranteeing Austrian independence.

They reason that France always has been close to the Little Entente made up of Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Rumania, and that combination repeatedly has warned that a Hapsburg restoration, either in Austria or Hungary, or both, would mean war.

To see Italy, in whose unmarried princess former Empress Zita sees an ideal wife for her elder son, approaching a complete understanding with the French-supported entente, has brought no joy to the Hapsburg adherents.

As a mater of fact, nobody is better aware of this situation than Otto himself and his "foreign minister," former Empress Zita. What they expect from the new year is not political but financial restoration.

In a few months, they are confident, the various estates belonging to the Austrian Crown, including the art treasures which they house (except the Hofburg and Schoenbrunn Castle), are, with a few exceptions, to be returned to Otto against certain guaranties of upkeep and under the condition that are galleries and libraries are to be open visitors.

The situation of Otto, then, will be much like that of the French pretender, who owns vast estates in France, but is not allweod to reside in that country.

Whether the former empress will be permitted to reside in Austria is not certain. But she is said to be planning to live there as soon as negotiations with the Viennese Cabinet have come to a conclusion. Otto's representatives in these negotiations are Count Max of Hohenberg, son of the Archduke Ferdinand, and Baron Wiesner, leader of the Austrian legitimists.

The tragic events at Vienna last summer, including the assassination of Chancellor Engebert Dollfuss, delayed the return of Zita and her family. The legitimists had planned an incognito visit to Austria by young Otto last summer.

The news of Otto's presence would not have been permitted to leak out until after his departure, and a second visit would have followed, its time governed by the reactions produced by his first visit.

and armies, and permission secured to re-photograph the invaluable archives in England, Germany, France, Italy and Austria. In America film were secured from the army and navy departments. Commercial films were also secured, and motion pictures showing events in Russia were obtained.

Picture of Bismark

"The First World War," begins with one of the first motion pictures ever made, Prince Bismark. Another picture shows the Prince of Wales at the age of 6 playing with his brother, the Duke of York, at Winsor Castle.

In Moscow the Czarevitch is seen at the age of 41 and there are pictures of the Czar and Czarina. The coronation of King George is recorded and the visit of the Kaiser to England in 1913. President Theodore Roosevelt and President Wilson appear in the scenes.

There are photographs of Ferdinand of Austria and the Emperor Franz Joseph, while the King and Queen of Italy appear, and celebrations at the German court with the Kaiser and his family. Scenes just after the assassination of Prince Ferdinand are shown and then comes the alarm of war and the mobilisation of the troops of various countries.

The outstanding personalities at this time are pictured, kings and queens, statesmen and generals, and there is an amazing close up of the Czarevitch at the age of 16.

Sea Battle Shown

From England are shown pictures of the Battle of the Dardenelles and the Battle of Jutland, the sinking of the Allied ships by torpedoes and the American transports. In the air sequences there are airplane flights, and zeppelin raids over London.

In conclusion, there is a medley of war scenes from all the countries engaged in the great struggle, from every angle, bombs exploding, tanks in action, trees uprooted, men dying by the roadside, a symphony of the realism of war. There is also shown a series of superimposed scenes of the turmoil and havoc since the war, a true picture of what war means, thrones wiped out, armies on the move, and at the end comes the German retreat, and two men rush out of the trenches to shake hands.

Dutch Trade Has Modest Increase During Year 1934

Employment Higher—Business Rise Expected—Banks Highly Liquid

Increased international trade difficulties in Europe are anticipated during 1935 by Dr. Hendrik Colijn, Dutch Prime Minister, according to the Amsterdam correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

Referring to the political situation which has such vital bearing on economic Europe, Dr. Colijn said in a recent interview, "Although I do not fear any direct war danger, I hold that political tensions will not disappear overnight. They past with its many mistakes cannot be pushed aside abruptly. One can only hope that gradually a better attitude will gain ground."

Meanwhile, a review of Dutch trade in 1934 shows, on the whole, a modest improvement.

Unemployment Drops

Unemployment showed a slightly downward trend, and railway-car loadings showed some increase. The tonnage of ships entering the port of Amsterdam exceeded somewhat the tonnage of 1933, while the number of vessels entering the New Waterway increased by about 10 per cent to 12,882 ships. Dutch exports saving deposits and the number of business failures all indicated some improvement as compared with 1933. Laid up tonnage in Amsterdam and Rotterdam decreased considerably, the greater part of it due to sale to interests abroad or through breaking up.

Expectations here for an upturn in business seem to hinge on America's currency policy. The general feeling among experts in financial and general business circles is that as soon as the United States sees fit definitely to stabilize the dollar, final stabilization of the pound will follow soon. This, it is contended, would result in a sound recovery in the Anglo-Saxon part of the world, which would also be of importance to the Netherlands.

The Netherlands' chief business problem centers round trade with Germany. Business with this country, once best customer, has shrunk to a mere fraction of its former size. And the other well of the Netherlands' prosperity, the Dutch East Indies, has also nearly dried up for the present.

Banks Liquid

Nevertheless, the Dutch banks enjoy a position of high solvency and liquidity, in spite of huge losses on German investments. This is attributed to their conservative policy and to the fact that Dutch business in general has avoided the mistake of some other countries, namely that of financing expansion in times of prosperity with the help of bank credits. 'Indebtedness" never was a serious problem for the Dutch banking system.

On the other hand the state of utter liquidity of the Dutch banks in 1934 narrowed the range of their activity and prevented the solution of the problem how to make the capital invested in the banks profitable.

The fact that the discount rate of the Netherlands Bank remained unchanged at 2½ per cent all through the year 1934 demonstrates clearly that the financial structure of Dutch business life did not suffer from any severe shocks in the year just ended. On the contrary, 1934 has been the first year since 1928 in which no change in the discount rate took place. In 1928 the discount rate took place. In 1928 the discount was 4½ per cent all the year round.

Central Bank Strong

The Dutch central bank, the Netherlands Bank, has not only weathered the financial storm which has been raging for five years, but has emerged stronger than ever. In July, 1929, a few months before the economic crisis began, the gold coverage of the florin amounted to 50.4 per cent, as liabilities up to a total of 866,000,000 florins ($850,000,000) were covered by gold amounting to 436,700,000 florins ($290,000,000). And today gold in the vaults of the Netherlands Bank has accumulated to 842,000,000 florins ($562,000,000) which cover liabilities aggregating 1,050,000,000 florins ($700,000,000) up to 80.2 per cent. So gold coverage of the florin has, in spite of the crisis of five years duration, gone up by 30 per cent. The unchanged low discount rate of 2½ per cent in 1934 is there to prove that the maintaining of the gold standard has not been achieved by specious means, but through ordinary, normal measures.

A Roving School Girl

Emma Muskett can say she is from any town in California, because during the seven years it took her to complete the grades, she attended 80 different schools in that state. School reports indicate that her work has been excellent. Her inability to stay in any one school very long is due to the fact that her father is an itinerant mechanic. As they move from town to town, she has attended the public schools of each for as many days or weeks as possible.

Doolittle Spans U.S. In 12 Hours

Breaks Old Record By Five Minutes In Hop From Coast With Passengers

Flying blind and battling the flier's most dreaded hazard, ice, all the way, Major James H. Doolittle set a new transcontinental mark across the United States for transport planes on January 15, according to the New York Times, whose article follows:

He set down the American Airlines' Vultee eight-passenger plane at Floyd Bennett Field 11 hours 59 minutes out of Burbank, Calif. This surpassed by nearly five minutes the time of the Eastern Air Lines Douglas, commanded by Captain E. V. Rickenbacker on its flight from Los Angeles to Newark last month. The record of racing planes is 10 hours 2 minutes, held by Colonel Roscoe Turner.

The pioneer of blind flying in this country had to put all his knowledge to the test to win safely through with his two passengers, Mrs. Doolittle and Robert Adamson of the of the California staff of the Shell Petroleum Products Corporation, for which Major Doolittle is aviation manager. It was, he admitted, the hardest flight with passengers in his experience.

Clouds Miscalculated

Studies of the weather map had promised good weather across the country before the take-off at 8:27 o'clock on Monday night. The skies were expected to be clear and the winds generally favorable above a local area of clouds. But the height of the clouds had been miscalculated.

Lifting the craft laden with 600 gallons of gas from the Burbank field and driving swiftly upward, Major Doolittle found that the clouds extended thousands of feet higher than had been expected. Around 15,000 feet altitude ice started to form.

Swerving the plane to break up the ice formations, Doolittle drove it doggedly higher until, at 16,000 feet, it was nearly at its ceiling under full load. And there he had to hold it for most of the journey. It was enough colder, about 27 degrees Fahrenheit, at that level to allow the moisture drops to congeal before they hit the racing wing. But they struck the plane's glistening metal like shot.

Through the ventilators most of the long flight, Mrs. Doolittle said, ice particles as big as her fingernail came in stingingly.

All the while it was black dark. The flier and his companions caught only one glimpse of the earth—snow-capped mountains over Colorado—until they came out of the cloud over Richmond, Va., just as the sun was struggling up. It was sheer blind flying by instrument all night long.

FUNERAL SERVICE FOR MISS MOON

Funeral services for Miss Mira B. Moon who died Wednesday morning at the Red Cross hospital following an automobile accident Monday noon, will be held at 3 p.m. Friday at the college chapel of Aoyama Gakuin where for many years she carried on her famous Bible class.

As Miss Moon had no relatives in Japan, the services will be under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Mission of which she was an associate member and of the Bible class. According to her wish expressed in her will, the body will be cremated and interred in Japan.

Miss Moon, an English instructor in the Tokyo Eighth Middle School, was struck by a taxi as she was alighting from a street car Monday noon in Aoyama. As the day was a holiday, it was several hours before medical aid could be obtained. At 4 p.m. that day, she was admitted to the Red Cross hospital where physicians gave her every care.

However, her fever rose during the night and the next day, her heart action became weak from the loss of blood she had suffered. The skin had been torn off her right arm and her body had been painfully bruised and cut. At 6 am Wednesday she died.

During the more than 20 years in Japan, Miss Moon had made countless friends both among the foreign community and the Japanese circles. Hundreds of these friends called at her home Wednesday after the body had been taken from the Red Cross hospital to her former residence at No. 81, Minami-cho, 5-chome, Aoyama.

Miss Moon was born 52 years ago in Cleveland and was graduated from the Ohio State University where she obtained a major in natural science. Interest in the flora and fauna of Japan and China brought her to the Orient for the first time 25 years ago. After a brief trip home, she returned to Japan to teach.

Her first teaching was done at the Seisoku English School in Kanda and then, after two years, she became an instructor at Aoyama Gakuin where she remained from 1913 to 1931. In her famous bible class at Aoyama Gakuin, she had more than 1,000 members. During the last few years she taught at the Tokyo Eighth Middle School and the Young Women's Christian Association.

Argentina Plans A Central Bank

capita of the population. (The population of Argentina was officially estimated at 11,846,655 on Dec. 31, 1932.)

It is provided that the central bank must maintain reserves of gold and bonds equivalent to 25 per cent of the oustanding currency of denominations higher than 5 pesos. The government's issue of smaller denominations would have no guaranteed backing.

Would Get Gold Holdings

With the abolition of the gold conversion office, the government's debt to it would be transferable to the central bank in the form of non-interest-bearing bonds. As the government issued small notes and coins, half of them would be deliverable to the central bank to reduce and eventually cancel this debt.

The floating debt is to be consolidated up to a total of 400,000,000 pesos by an issue of 3 per cent treasury bonds, to be taken over at par by the central bank and used as reserves to back up currency.

The entire project is being violently attacked by the newspapers opposed to the government of President Augustin P. Justo on the ground that it is inflationary. The Socialist bloc in Congress has issued a statement saying that it will not attend sessions in the hope of preventing consideration of the measures because of lack of a quorum. They are opposed not so much to the content of the projects as to the government's efforts to force them through hurriedly at an extra session.

Institute Elects Lewis, Its Critic

Parent Group Of The American Academy, Assailed By Writer, Makes Him A Member

Sinclair Lewis, who slightly more than four years ago shocked the conservative literary world by denouncing the American Academy of Arts and Letters, was elected on January 16 to membership in the National Institute of Arts and Letters, the parent organization from which the academy selects its members, according to the New York Times.

It was in December, 1930, that Mr. Lewis, first American winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature, included in his acceptance address before the Swedish Academy in Stockholm an attack on the American Academy of Arts and Letters. He charged the American organization with deliberately cutting itself off from all that is living, vigorous and original in American letters.

"It does not represent literary America today," he said. "It represents only Henry Wardsworth Longfellow."

Writer Will Accept

It was said at the institute last night that assurance had been received of Mr. Lewis's readiness to accept the invitation, so he is not expected to decline this honor as he did the award of the Pulitzer Prize for Literature in 1926.

When Mr. Lewis's attack on the academy was recalled last night it was pointed out that the institute does not elect members because of their personalities but because of their contribution to letters and the arts, and Mr. Lewis had undeniably made a significant contribution.

Mr. Lewis's election was unanimous, as were those of all other new members chosen. The elections took place at the annual meeting of the institute in the building it occupies jointly with the American Academy at 633 West 155th Street. Many of America's most distinguished men of letters, artists and musical figures are members of the two organizations.

The complete list of the new members is:

Department of Literature

Maxwell Anderson, author and playwright, born at Atlantic, Pa., Dec. 15, 1888, formerly editorial writer on The New Republic, New Morning World; co-author of "What Price Glory" and author of "Elizabeth the Queen," "Both Your Houses" and "Mary of Scotland."

Marc Connelly, playwright, born at McKeesport, Pa., Dec. 13, 1890. Began as reporter of The Pittsburgh Sun, co-author of "Dulcy," "To the Ladies," "Beggar on Horseback" and "The Green Pastures."

Sinclair Lewis, author, born at Sauk Center, Minn., Feb. 7, 1885. Formerly reporter and editor. Author of "Main Street," "Babbitt," "Arrowsmith," "Elmer Gantry," "The Man Who Knew Coolidge," "Dodsworth," and other novels. He won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1930.

Kenneth L. Roberts, author, born at Kennebunk, Me., Dec. 8, 1885. Was reporter and special writer, captain in the Intelligence Section, Siberian Expeditionary Force, 1918-19. Novels include "Arundel," "The Lovely Lady" and "Rabble in Arms."

Department Of Art

Herbert Haseltine, sculptor, born, Rome, Italy, April 10, 1877. Represented in a number of museums, including the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Charles Hopkinson, painter, born Cambridge, Mass., July 27, 1869. Won medals at the Pan-American and St. Louis Expositions and other exhibitions.

Harry W. Watrous, painter, born in San Francisco, Sept. 17, 1857. Winner of many prizes for his paintings, which hang in many American museums.

Mahonri Young, painter, sculptor and etcher, born Salt Lake City, Utah, Aug. 9, 1877. Represented in many American museums, including the Metropolitan.

Department Of Music

Howard Hanson, composer and conductor, and educator, born Wahoo, Neb., Oct. 28, 1896. Director of the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., since 1924.

Leo Sowerby, composer and organist, born Grand Rapids, Mich., May 1, 1895, instructor at the American Conservatory of Music, Chicago.

All the officers of the institute were re-elected with the exceptions of Thornton Wilder as a vice president and Walter Prichard Eaton as secretary, who asked that they be not re-elected because of pressure of other work. They were succeeded respectively by Ernest Schelling and Henry Seidel Canby.

Mr. Lewis has been a conspicuous figure in American letters since his novel "Main Street" lifted him from relative literary obscurity in 1920. In his address before the Swedish Academy in 1930 he championed the entire "left wing" of American literature and his address bristled with attacks on the old order.

The late Rev. Dr. Henry van Dyke, Princeton professor, author and active member of the American Academy, had attacked the award of the Nobel Prize to Mr. Lewis, who in his address in Stockholm, replied to the criticism.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Opera House In Two Countries

Up on the boundary line between Vermont and Canada is a city that is really three cities in one because one part is in Derby Line, Vermont, another part in Stanstead, Quebec, and a third part in Rock Island, Quebec.

Almost in the center of this city is the Haskell Opera House, which is situated in such a unique manner on the international boundary that the stage is in Canada and the audience sits in the United States.

Spanish Cortes Ends Loquacity For Speed

call a count and have the session adjourned if fewer than 70 deputies were present. Greater control of proceedings is given to the Speaker after a study of the world's oldest parliamentary systems.

The quorum is reduced to 200 votes, this number being considered sufficient for any government to muster at any time, and the lowest figure with which a government could remain in office.

Important, finally, is the reformed procedure for revision of the Constitution, one of the chief aims of the present governors of Spain. Instead of two thirds, one quarter of the total membership of some 450 deputies of Cortes may demand revision of the Constitution. Thus, it is pointed out, the Roman Catholics and their close allies, the Agrarians, could easily introduce a project of constitutional reform.

Such reform will probably be sought in October of next year when the Cortes can normally dissolve itself after a two-year term in session and allow the election of a new legislative body to discuss and vote on the desired reform.

Approval by the Cortes of the new standing orders, which took effect as from Dec. 11, should do much to retrieve its lost prestige in the eyes of the people. Considerable criticism has been levelled at it during the last year for its failure to achieve practical results in much-needed social legislation, due to an obsession with political problems.

The man in the street does not realize that the Government may have known that a revolution was coming and therefore concentrated on strengthening its position. Instead, he reproaches it with having wasted time on political squabbles and passed only the clergy pensions and general amnesty bills.

Now the new standing orders will give the needed speed-up in debate.

SENDAI MOVEMENT

In Sendai, a rather interesting movement is gaining popularity among the foreign residents and those Papanese interested in the development of foreign language. Already many names are affixed to a ptition which seeks to secure at the local theaters, showing foreign motion pictures, at least one performance a week without the interference of the "Benshi" or interpretor. Regarding this petition, an article in the local press states that one theater will probably act favorably upon receipt of the petition.

The other theater concerned is more doubtful with the observation that cultural level of Sendai is yet too low for such an innovation.

U.S. Cannot Back League On Chaco

Resolution That Authorized Her Embargo Stressed It Must Apply To Both Disputants

The long-deferred question of what the United UStates would do if circumstances necessitated active cooperation with the League of Nations faced the administration on Jan. 17 as the result of action the day previous by the League Assembly's Chaco Committee invoking preliminary sanctions against Paraguay in her armed dispute with Bolivia.

The State Department had not yet been informed officially at that time of the action at Geneva recommending that members of the League raise restrictions against the exports of arms and muntions to Bolivia. Officials, however, began anew their studies of the anomalous position of the United States on the basis of newspaper dispatches reporting the action of the League committee says the New York Times.

One of the first conclusions reported privately to have been reached by officials was that the United States could not join with League members in assisting Bolivia by partly relaxing the arms embargo invoked last May on exports to both countries.

Authority for Our Action

The dual embargo was invoked by most of the major countries of the world, following the American lead. However, the action here was taken by the administration under authority of a Congressional joint resolution that specifically granted the right to forbid exports of arms "to the countries now engaged" in armed conflict in the Chaco.

The resolution was drafted in those terms and adopted unanimously by the House of Representatives and the Senate after it had been established that Congress would balk at giving the President discretionary rights to forbid exports to only one of the countries.

Beyond the embargo question, officials found further topics for serious consideration if the League should find itself in the position of facing the invoking of sanctions provided in the League Covenant but never before called into play.

As interpreted in informed quarters here, the preliminary step of the League Chaco committee envisages further steps after Feb. 24, the date to which time for agreement by Paraguay to mediation was extended, involving a potential economic boycott of Paraguay and a possible blockade. the final steps for bringing into line members of the League that refuse to abide by its decisions.

Britain's Attitude

If the ultimate steps were reached, it was stated privately here, the only League member that could enforce a blockade would be Great Britain. That country, in turn, has repeatedly assured the United States that it would never undertake punitive action in the Western Hemisphere without the consent of the United States, which raises the possibility, admittedly remote, that the United States would be placed in the position of deciding whether the League should discipline a member in Latin America.

Throughout the whole course of the League's study of the Chaco dispute after it assumed jurisdiction on the grounds that both Bolivia and Paraguay were members, the administration has steered a narrow course, aimed both at avoidance of interference in the affairs of Latin America and at equally careful avoidance of becoming a party to the League's work.

Advices here indicate that Bolivia accepted the League's proposals on Dec. 10, but Paraguay is said to have twice declined them, the last time on Monday of this week.

Regret that what he styled Paraguay's request for the revision of findings by a subcommittee of the League should have been interpreted as opposition to the League was expressed by Dr. Enrique Bordenave, the Paraguayan Minister.

"We stand morally condemned as aggressors, where all we have done is to ask modification of the League plan," he said. "We have always maintained that the Chaco is a boundary, not a territorial question. The Chaco belongs to Paraguay. The only question is where it ends."

Dr. Enrique Finot, the Bolivian Minister, declared that "all nations of the world that are interested in peace and justice ought to cooperate efficaciously with the action at Geneva."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Leper Money

The United States maintains a leper colony on Culion, one of the islands in the western part of the Philippine Archipelago.

About 5500 lepers are settled in Culion under the direction of the U.S. Public Health Service. They form a regular municipality and among other things have their own money, of the type illustrated. They are cared for by a few intrepid sisters of charity and by a Jesuit Father.

"Greater Friend Hath No Man"

A story as strange as fiction, pathetic and unique, was brought to light on May 10, 1933 showing the undying love and affection of a little terrier dog for his master. John S. Hendrix, an elderly recluse who lived near Ripley, Tennesee, died the latter part of April, 1933, and his dog was the chief mourner. Hendrix was buried near his home by neighbors, and the little dog, "Spot," was taken by Sammy Smith, a farmer. But in his grief the dog refused to eat, and in a few days disappeared. Smith suspected Spot was looking for his master, and to his amazement found that he had dug a hole in the grave and was lying dead on the coffin of the only person he had ever loved—dead from a broken heart.

Knowing the love Hendrix and the dog had for one another, Farmer Smith covered the grave just as he found it, and the two pals sleep on undisturbed.

Political Truce In Cuba Appears More Remote

the vacant posts, with rival military chieftains perhaps battling for supremacy, conceivably plunging the island into a new civil war.

The question of general elections looms closer as a problem which cannot be dodged much longer. The Government has suspended constitutional guarantees and decreed that anyone convicted of burning cane or committing sabotage tending to impede sugar crops activities will be punished by death or life imprisonment.

Although it seems certain elections will be postponed again from March 3 to a time when the sugar crop is ground and out of the way, it is probable the postponement will be the last one.

The plans provide for choice of a constituent assembly, but there is a chance for a change so that the people will vote for a president and a congress as well as local officer, letting the congress draw up a new constitution.

Zweig To Publish New Book In Fall

Austrian Author Has Written Book On Mary, Queen Of Scots

Stefan Zweig, Austrian author and psychographer, who was in New York for a fortnight on business, recently announced that his next book, to be published there in the autumn, will be a study of Mary Queen of Scots. It will be "a sister book," he explained, to his successful "Marie Antoinette."

Mr. Zweig arrived on the Italian liner Conte di Savola and took a suite at the Astor. He has found it necessary to decline several invitations to lecture, he said, for his stay would be brief and he has conferences scheduled with friends and business associates, among them his publishers, the Viking Press.

"I have finished my new book," Mr. Zweig told an interviewer. "It will be called 'The Queen of Scots.'

"Of course, there is an enormous literature on Mary now. There are two kinds of book that one can write on a historial subject—one if no book has been writen on it, and the other if there have been too many. I'm not sure how you say it in English—'You can't see the forest for too many trees?'

Seeks to Pierce Mystery

"The subject of Mary will always be fascinating because of a certain quality of mystery and secrecy about her. Only by logical psychology can one hope to show the whole, clear character. As so often happens in life, this woman had one great moment of passion. All the tragedy of Mary's life was packed into two years of her forty-four—the two years of great passion with Bothwell.

"Mary developed late. Not until the age of twenty-three did she mature emotionally. And at twenty-five it was finished. There was a concentration of all the energies of the soul into that short time. That's why it had such drive, such force, like an explosion.
